FUTURE FLYING TREND TALKED

Transportation of Fruits and Other Perishable Goods Stressed

Possibilities visioned for air transportation of fruit and even of turkeys, were presented to the Salem Lions club yesterday by Lieut. "Scout" Hazelwood, pilot and instructor for the Eyerly aviation school. He also spoke briefly on aviation maneuvers at the Oregon national guard encampment which closed Monday.

Hazelwood paid high compliments to the efficiency of the national guardsmen, and especially the 162nd infantry, of which Company B of Salem is a unit. He said he hoped an air squadron may be organized by next year, and pointed to test day by the California guard has two air units, and Washington one.

He told of work the three airplanes at camp did from 11:30 to 3:30 each day in observation and information aids to the field troops. It was necessary to report movements every three minutes, he said.

During the combat demonstration last Saturday, three of the airplanes, thinking firing had begun, swooped low through the firing lines to test day by Lieut. Hazelwood declared the freight business to be the better side to develop. Eyerly, in carrying about 600 pounds of cherries by airplane to Denver last week, is believed to have pioneered the first shipment of fruit by air.

Already the Eyerly company is planning design and construction of a large freight plane that will carry between two and three tons of fruit. With such a plane, and such large shipments, costs of transportation would not be considerably greater than by rail or truck, Hazelwood said. He pointed also to the excellent condition in which air-shipped fruit will arrive, judging from the cherry experiment.

Hazelwood said turkey growers of Roseburg only a few days ago proposed to Eyerly that these birds be shipped to Denver and other markets by air. Possibilities of loading the return plane with some commodity not found here was also mentioned.

PROMISE OF SMALL TOWN RADIO TOPIC

Concluding his discussion of the commercial future of the small community, Dr. Julius Kiel, assistant secretary of commerce of the United States, will broadcast on Sunday, June 28, a talk entitled "Present Forces Favoring Small Town Business", over the coast to coast network of the Columbia Broadcasting system. The talk will be heard locally through station KOIN at 3 p. m., Sunday.

Having outlined on June 21 some of the factors that have tended toward the lessening of small town trade, especially in the retail stores, Dr. Kiel will now present a picture of the factors that apparently hold much of promise. He will show how some of the modern miracles of science, tending to end isolation and virtually annihilate distance, should help the industrial up-building of the smaller places, stimulating business in varied lines and aiding in the retention of trade by the local stores.

Airways, radio, television, highways, busses, the long distance transmission of power, will figure in this phase of the assistant secretary's talk. Taking specific towns in different parts of the country which have made striking advances recently, Dr. Kiel will undertake to analyze the reasons for that achievement.
