Eccentric Teacher Refused Treat To Students: Resultant Episode Named Popcorn School District

By CLARA PEARCE SMITH URIOSITY is sometimes expressed as to the location of the Popcorn neighborhood, locally famous for its enterprising spirit and hospitality. The Popcorn school house is situated five miles west of Salem, almost at the summit of the Orchard Heights hills and is one of the pioneer districts of Polk county having been organized in the year 1867 as district number 36. At that time, a small building was erected by volunteer labor which served the community as a seat of learning and social center until the present modern structure was erected in 1912. The single door of the first little building opened inward, not outward. Its seven small windows were not scientifically placed with a view to conserving eyesight and sanitary laws were blithely violated but out from its walls and from the little white church adjoining have gone men and women who have contributed creditably to the bone and sinew of the commonwealth.

Among them were three preachers, a college president, a foreign missionary, a doctor, two representatives in the legislative halls at Salem, many successful business men and women and in-

The first teacher in the district was an eccentric character, Napoleon Franklin Nelson, familiarly known as "Poley." He was small of stature, much smaller than some of his pupils. At the close of the first term these young men demanded that "Poley" treat the school.

Getting no satisfactory response they took the teacher down the ravine below the school house and held him suspended over the brawling waters of the brook until he promised to treat. On returning to the school house, "Poley" produced a flour sack filled with popped corn.

From that day to this, district 36 has been known as the Popcorn school. Efforts have been made from time to time to change its title to something more commensurate with the modern idea of dignity and suitability but these efforts have always failed. The Orchard Heights neighborhood of which Popcorn is the nucleus is, as its name implies, a rich fruit producing district,
