Larger Shipments, Export Better Cotton, Wheat Trading Factors Inquiry Slackening On Street Among Causes

Wheat futures markets declined sharply toward the close of the week, influenced by larger world shipments, some slackening in export inquiry for North American wheat, a sharp break in the stock market and more favorable weather in domestic winter wheat areas, according to the weekly grain market review of the U.S. bureau of agricultural economics.

Cash wheat prices at the principal markets, however, did not follow the decline in futures, but held about steady, with the moderate offerings meeting an active mill demand at most points. Feed grains had independent strength, with light receipts only about equal to current trade requirements. Rye fluctuated with wheat. but had a steady undertone, reflecting the short domestic supply. Flax held about unchanged, with moderate offerings meeting a fair crusher demand.

Pacific coast wheat markets were independently weak, reflecting the lack of an export outlet for northwestern wheat and the relatively small domestic mill demand. No export sales of wheat were possible at prevailing prices and domestic mills were taking only moderate amounts because of slow flour business. Receipts at Columbia river and Puget sound markets increased to 849 cars for the week, but these were largely deliveries on earlier sales and current offerings by growers and country shippers were not large. No new allotments of wheat to mills making flour for shipment to China were made during the week, but deliveries of both wheat and flour on that sale were reported going forward according to schedule.

California wheat markets declined 5c to 10c per 100 largely in sympathy with lower prices in northern and intermountain markets.

regularity stocks moved forward somewhat briskly. Principal interest in the stock market centered around railroad securities. They followed a zigzag course, with Pennsylvania and New Haven going to new lows under weight of concern over New Haven's next dividend action, now slated for December 8. Because of its large investment in New Haven, Pennsylvania shared in the decline When word reached the market that train workers on the Georgia & Florida had voluntarity agreed to a 10 per cen cut in wages, hope was stimulated that the rail unions throughout the country might agree to such action. There was enough doubt manifested, however, to temper enthusiasm.
