Marionville, Marion Station, Marion Junction or Marion Center. There are numerous Marion counties; the writer has not taken the time to count them.

There are Marion mountains, rivers, lakes and what not. General Francis Marion was born in South Carolina in 1732; lived until 1785.

The Marion postoffice in Oregon which is in Marion county, got its name in rather an interesting manner; by the mistake of a shipping clerk. It was so named because it was situated in Marion county. When the Oregon & California railroad was being built in the early seventies the officials decided to locate a station near Mill creek, at the present site of Turner.

This proposed station was to be called Marion. Material for a station and warehouse was sent out from Portland; rather from East Portland, but the man in charge of the shipment made a mistake and threw it off at the present site of Marion, a few miles south. When the officials found this had been done, they concluded to finish the building and retain the name of Marion for the present town of that name.

They subsequently had an additional shipment sent to the place they had first in mind and built a station there and called it Marion. The present station near resident of that section, Henry L. Turner.

HYSLOP ADVISES ON CLOVER PLANTINGS

Says Hardy Eastern Seed Will Best Meet Eastern Market Demand

MONMOUTH, Feb. 27.—Professor G. A. Hyslop of Oregon State College and County agent J. R. Beck spoke to a group of Monmouth and Perrydale farmers this weekend on growing hardy clover varieties. In 1930, 820 acres were seeded to Hardy Ohio red clover in Polk county, 800 acres of which were harvested with most of the seed grading No. 1.

Professor Hyslop says that several midwest and eastern state areas are cooperating with the experiment station of Oregon State college by growing test plots back there of our Willamette valley grown Ohio red seed, to ascertain if it will stand the cold eastern winters. The college furnished seed for the eastern experiments.

In 1932, the Polk county crop of Ohio red seed will be light, due to ravages of the crown borer.

Last fall, 300 acres of hardy Tennessee red clover were seeded in Polk. All farmers of the Willamette valley are advised to seed any contemplated acreage to hardy eastern seed in order to meet eastern market demands. Willamette valley red seed is used considerably in the eastern states.

It was pointed out by Professor Hyslop, as the western seed possessor a special color and brightness required by eastern state clover laws, which their own seeds do not have.
