HOP GROWERS TO FORM UNIT

All Interested Invited; Library School Will be Held Wednesday

INDEPENDENCE, March 19.—Hop growers of this section will meet in the city hall at 8 o'clock Wednesday night to form a local unit of the Oregon Hop Growers, a newly organized state wide movement of which Dean H. Walker of Independence is the president.

D. P. MacCarthy will be the chairman for the meeting at which a president, vice president, secretary and treasurer, and one delegate to the state unit will be elected. It has been announced that anyone interested in the hop industry is invited to attend the meeting.

The Oregon Hop Growers' unit has for its objective the promotion and betterment of the hop industry in Oregon. Its membership consists of two classes, A, the producer or dealer of hops in the state of Oregon, and B, any individual or firm associated with the hop industry or whose desire is to support the objects of the organization. Class A members only have the right to vote. Class B members may attend the open meetings and have a part in the discussions.

A 4-H Club New, the first to be organized in Polk county, has been added to the club activities of the Independence training school. Mrs. Harry Keeney, critic-teacher of the 6th grade, is the club leader and the members are Glen Burck, Delbert Taylor, James Hartman, John Snyder, Llewellyn Arrel, Roy Hanns, Elmer Cuthbert, Ada Wells, and Mavis DeCoster.

The club, accompanied by J. R. Beck, Polk county agent, is planning a trip Tuesday, March 29 to the Peavy resort, a State college plant located between Monmouth and Corvallis.

Library School
The state librarian has arranged for a school of instruction Wednesday afternoon, March 23, 22, 1795, and his crew planted the first vegetable seeds used by whites in the old Oregon country, that spring, on an island (or islands) in the Columbia near its mouth. They planted "peas, beans, potatoes and several peach stones and radishes, mustard, cresses and celery seed," with the idea that when they came back in the fall they would have fresh vegetables. Some potatoes, at least, grew, and they found them "mealy," according to the log book. T. C. Elliott some years ago found the log book of the Ruby, and thus uncovered some fragments of fact that every other historian had overlooked.

"Granting that tale to be true does not mean that this was a name current among the Rocky mountains or the plains tribes, or those of Minnesota. It might have been the name applied by the Mohawks, or some other of the Iroquoian tribes of New York or Canada. With them it would not have been a name currently used, but one mentioned only in response to inquiry, or by some retired canoe man or trapper; and might have been a French name. The French had been going into the Mississippi valley and to the region of Lake Winnipeg and its tributary streams for many years prior to 1760. They were the forerunners of exploration and trade in those regions, and the Iroquois who accompanied them necessarily heard and used words of the French tongue.

"In the application of place names it was the custom of Indians to use a name descriptive of some physical feature of a stream, or of the locality through which it flowed, and the same custom prevailed among the French. When the French bestowed a name they did so either in honor of some saint in their religious calendar, or by some descriptive word. Every state in the Old Northwest and in Old Oregon contains many instances of such nomenclature.

"The name Ouragon is practically the same as Ouragan, a word to be found in any French dictionary meaning windstorm, hurricane or tornado. The River of the West was, in 1765 et circa (and thereabouts), supposed to rise in western Minnesota and to flow westward through Dakota and Montana—where blizzards in winter and tornadoes in summer are still known to prevail.

"And we may carry the analogy still further.

"It is a meteorological fact that what is known in Oregon as the Chinook wind does at times exert a remarkable influence even in Montana and Dakota.

"The River of the West was flowing into the region from which THAT REMARKABLE WIND CAME and hence called, by some Indians or Frenchmen, Ouragon.

"This seems to be the origin of the name OREGON. The map makers of those years did not get hold of the name. It was obscure.

"As to Jonathan Carver's dependence upon Robert Rogers, there are proofs in abundance that the discussion of that relationship will be more properly in connection with another document which discloses the plans of Major Rogers for his agents in the west. As to the name OREGON, however, attention is called to the brief endorsement at the end of the second of the documents: 'Lent the two plans to Capt. Carver 15 Feb. 1778. It is thus revealed that Carver had these two proposals to draw up when completing his book and his map.' (On Carver's map the name is spelled Origan.)

Thus if, as Mr. Elliott concludes (and he is excellent authority), Oregon is derived from the French word ouragan, meaning windstorm, hurricane or tornado, and if the French voyagers applied it to the chinook wind, it is quite appropriate, for in the breath of that wind there is everything that means mildness of climate.

The chinook wind comes from the direction of the section where the Chinook Indians lived, hence that designation—on the lower Columbia, on the north side, Captain Chas. Bishop, commander of the ship Ruby from Detroit, England, in his log book always called the Columbia the Chinook river. He arrived in that river May
