

BERRY EXPERIMENT
STATION IS OPENED

Growers Invited to Visit
June 3 at Corvallis;
Many Tests Made

One of the greatest centers of strawberry experimental work in the west will be open for public inspection at the annual field day for strawberry growers at Oregon State college at Corvallis, Friday, June 3.

Growers will have opportunity that day to view many developments in cultural and varietal experiments as carried on for many years. Irrigation versus non-irrigation for the Marshall berries will be viewed under field conditions. A four-year-old field and a two-year-old field of the new Corvallis variety will be open for inspection.

Topping experiments with the Marshall berry, showing the effect of cutting the tops immediately after harvest compared with later may be viewed, as will an experiment with double planting as compared with the usual spacing.

Most interest is expected to be shown in the breeding work where close to 35,000 seedlings and selections will be fruiting. These will include 12,000 seedlings fruiting for the first time, 23,000 of last year's seedlings retained for the second year, 219 selections from the 1930 seedlings, and 266 selections from the 1931 group.

In addition there will be growing on the experimental farm many of the varieties brought here from other sections for test, such as the Redheart and several others believed to hold promise for special uses.

Visitors may come to the college farm, one mile east of the Willamette bridge at Corvallis, either at 10 o'clock in the morning or 2 o'clock in the afternoon when groups will be formed. The farm will be open all day, however, from 8 to 5 o'clock. Pest and disease specialists will also be there to answer questions.
