Gained Fame by Admitting Responsibility of Loss By Michigan Team

William Dennison Clark, who committed suicide here Tuesday in a local hotel, gained national attention as an athlete a quarter of a century ago when he shouldered the sole responsibility for the loss of a famous football game. Facts which came to light here Wednesday and possessions in Clark's room at the time of his death, revealed this circumstance.

Denny Clark, as he was better known 23 years ago when he won fame on the gridiron as a member of the team coached by the famous Fielding H. Yost, threw away a battle against life as he lost a football game in 1905. He killed himself in order that a family, which he admitted in a suicide letter to his wife, might benefit by his final play.

Denny Clark may be remembered by followers of football lore as the man "who lost that game to Chicago 2 to 0 in 1905". Clark, it is shown in documents found in his possession, always answered the question in the af-mative and had vouchsaled splanation.

Denny Clark, Michigan alumni and football fans recall, made a mistake in the 1905 game in attempting to make a touchback in order to bring the ball into play further down the field, but was safety, causing
