Growers Interested in new Developments Despite Slump in Market

Strawberry prices may be ruinously low this year, but leaders in the berry production in western Oregon are still intensely interested in furthering and improving this industry, judging from the sentiments expressed by more than 200 growers and farm leaders who attended the annual strawberry day at the Oregon Experiment station farm at Corvallis

Most of the larger successful BATTERY ELECTRICIAN growers from Clackamas, Washington, Marion, Linn, Lane and other valley counties, attended. Particular interest centered on the new berry, U. S. D. A. No. 520, which Dr. George W. Darrow, berry breeding specialist of the federal department of agriculture, believes will replace the Marshall or Oregon berry, just as the new Corvallis is likely to pass the Ettersburg in favor as a canning

This berry yielded 9 1/2 tons to the acre at Hood River last year compared with one to three tons for the Clark seedling. It has a fine appearance, ripens more evenly than the Marshall, has a much better plant and is generally considered a higher quality. A number of the growers are already experimenting with it and these reported favorably on it at the field day meeting. Growers expressed confidence in the future of berry growing in this state, believing that conditions will improve for those who are in the business in earnest.
