College Students Get Geological Lecture at Fossil Beds Near Scio

SCIO, July 12.—Ten million years ago what is now Oregon was nothing more than two large islands intersected by a huge bay," stated Fred Roner, janitor at Oregon State college, in a short descriptive talk given Saturday at the fossil beds near Scio.

"During the Oligocene age, considered by geologists to be from ten to twelve million years ago, the present fossil beds were formed by volcanic action and were preserved under water," Mr. Roner said.

The Oligocene age, preceding the ice age, was at a time when Oregon was under water, with only the Shoshone and Siskiyou islands visible. The large body of water between the two islands was known as the Chilo embayment.

Mr. Roner has traced the strata to which the Scio fossil beds belong from Knox Butte near Albany, to regions in the vicinity of Mehama. Fossil beds of similar appearance have also been found near Eugene and in the hills between Albany and Corvallis.

Mr. Roner is of the opinion that the Oligocene strata was formed entirely by the washing of sediment under water, because of the plants resembling present-day horse-tails found growing vertically in the strata. Imprints of leaves, mainly of those of hardwood trees, have been found in the fossil beds near Scio. Leaves like those of the present-day sycamore, maple, willow, birch, fir and yew trees have been identified. The rock found in the Scio fossil beds are of the nature of volcanic ash, while those found near Eugene are of sandstone formation.

About 100 students of the state college, under the direction of Dr. J. B. Horner, made the trip. Dr. Prill of Scio took several pictures of the group at the scene of the excavations.

Banket lunch was had at the A. T. Powell farm near the fossil beds after the latter were inspected and many specimens selected. Following the lunch hour the caravan proceeded to the historic Providence church, founded in 1853, by Joab Powell, father of A. T. Powell of Scio, and other early-day circuit riders of this section of the Willamette valley.

At this old shrine Riley Shelton of Scio, historian of the church, made a brief address reviewing in an interesting manner some of the authentic history of the church and its early struggles in the wilderness of a frontier infested with Indians.

W. F. Robbins and son will start baling hay this week on H. W. Libby's farm. In keeping with other wage cutting they have reduced the price of baling considerable and expect a big run as this is the largest hay snap in that has been produced in years in this section.
