SALEM BETTER OFF THAN EAST, AVERS

D. D. Dotson, Employment Officer, Finds Jobless in Midwest Numerous

As far as industry and employment are concerned, Salem appears better than midwestern and eastern cities, D. D. Dotson, assistant manager of the U. S.-Y. M. C. A. Employment bureau, reported on his return here yesterday from a 4500-mile round trip to West Virginia.

"Things look better around Salem than any place I visited," he said. "When I got back to Salem I was really surprised to see the prosperous conditions."

"Every chance I had, I inquired especially about labor conditions. The Denver employment office reported 35,000 persons unemployed, about 10 per cent of the city's population. Other cities were approximately the same."

"This was my seventh round trip across the continent. Always before there was a fog of smoke above the industrial districts. This time the cities were clear of smoke, excepting Kansas City."

People are Optimistic
"Through the midwestern farm districts, houses have an unpainted appearance and barns are shabby, where before things looked prosperous. As a rule, however, I found the people with a fair amount of optimism for the future."

Mr. Dotson was called to Greenwood, Va., two weeks ago to be with his father who was critically ill. When he left his home to return to Salem, his father had practically recovered from his illness.
