Sage of Salem

their gills. Beyond a small supply of the species mentioned in the liquid measure tables we had no gills. Which helped only somewhat. Any part in a storm, you know, and any gill in a fog. And those were degenerate days.

Our captain caused the boat to be anchored and ordered the while to be blown at short intervals. A neglect of these measures, he said, might result in catastrophe. Also, he said, catastrophe might come in spite of them. Which, of course, put everybody into a cheerful frame of mind.

Our immediate party discussed

the congressional race going on between Ribble, the present incumbent, and Dapple, the contender, who was a proficient liar and a friend of Hara, and was believed by honest men, as is frequently the case under such circumstances.

Wasn't that like life? Happy anticipations all gone for naught. No codfishing. No more gills in the bottle. Nothing but gloomy political talk, soup with fog.

I was too young at the time to do little but listen. My companions were seasoned voters of the "for God and home and native land" variety.

Said Ben: "Ribble has been a great disappointment to me. The weather has been terrible most of the time since he went on the job.

He doesn't take an engaging photograph. He reads his speeches. Also, he is a bum wisecracker. We need a change."

"He is an able man, isn't he?"

Ben tossed a facetious scorn at me. "What's that got to do with it?" he demanded.

"The candidate of your party,

Ben, but—"

The talk oozed along like this, off and on, until the darkness of night merged with the fog. Suddenly bells jingled in the engine room. The anchor chain rattled. "There's the light on Rooster Point," the captain pointed.

"Dim, but there she is, shining through the fog. The light on Hen Island doesn't show tonight; too far down; doesn't get its head out of the fog. The smart boys at Washington are trying to abandon the Rooster Point light from what they call motives of economy. They'd have done it before now if it hadn't been for Congressman Riddle. And now we'll be going home."

A new five-cent cigar appears on the market every day or two. Which is one reason, perhaps, why we see so many wrinkled noses.

I reckon we wouldn't have so many colds if it weren't for the fresh air enthusiasts. Chillsblains should be confined to the feet. The imagination is no place for 'em.

The current Stayton Mall carries good news. Two excellent wells have been located in that town by means of "water witching." Just wait till I find that guy who told me it couldn't be done!
