Toss out of Ring Deciding Factor: Figure-Four is Successful Once

Demonstrating for the benefit of the ring to aid him in "bearing of any fans who may have forgotten that he is most dangerous when cornered, Robin Reed came back to the armory Tuesday night after an absence of nearly five months and defeated Bobby Novak in a hard fought match after once falling victim to Bobby's deadly figure-four scissors.

Officially, Reed won the deciding fall with a body slam, but the deciding factor was a terrific jolt Novak took when he went hurtling over the ropes and alighted on various hard objects though the force of his fall was partly broken by an unfortunate feminine fan who absorbed some of the impact. Nevertheless Novak's back was injured and he was barely able to crawl back into the ring and lose the match there in short order. The time was 11:05.

Reed had won the first one in 24:45 with a whip wristlock after Maybe the point of view differs a lot of hard tussling in which epending on the distance; we Novak, apparently not yet ready thought it was rather small of to try consistently for his figuresome Oregon boys to consider go- four, had Reed in hot water with like a dishrag.

The second round featured principally the famous figurefour. Reed avoided it cleverly a number of times, but Novak slipped it on several times before it succeeded. Once Reed, in that agonizing grip, walked out through the ropes onto the press table, down into the crowd and back up the steps to the ring, with Novak pleading to have the hold broken because it was breaking his leg. On another occasion Reed broke it Tate Motor company is defendant with a sidewise slam. Novak put it on for the fall in 10:15.
