mercial and Fir." That was "French Louie." but the compiler made rather a poor stagger at the spelling of his name. His property was at Commercial and Fir. east side of Commercial, but Fir street, showing on original plats, was never opened, and does not now exist. There was a lawsuit involving rights there, on account of the fact that the street was never opened, in the trial of which R. P. Boise recalls that he was a witness, also C. L. Parmenter.

Voisan to John G. Wright, and title some years later went to Benjamin Forstner, old time Salem gunsmith and capitalist, who came to Oregon with the Aurora colony people in the fifties. Forstner erected a large residence, in late years occupied by several prominent people, including the Emmons family, and just now vacant. The number of the house is 888 North Commercial street. DuVoisan at first built for himself a very small shack near the bank of Mill creek. He later had erected a better house, of lumber, fronting near Commercial street; but the new one was also small and unpretentious. He lived entirely alone; called on no one, and no one called on him. He was a recluse. But he was often seen on the business streets -and he was never known to appear up town without a silk hat -called in those days a "store 52.8 pipe hat"-and with a swallowtailed coat of once fashionable cut, and an elegant cane. His manners comported with his faultless apparel; he was always a gentleman; polite to the nth degree, affable, compaionable. 5 5 5 As he grew old he took on flesh; became fat. This explains the fact that it was an easy thing for the youngsters of the town to small his grapes-he could not run after them and give them the treatment they had coming, as any one of them now living will freely admit. Besides, away down in his heart, the kindly old man perhaps did not begrudge any of them the grapes, within reason. But Judge McMahan avers that most of the boys with his gang took more than But generally speaking, not so they needed. They were like the colored boy with the large watermelon, who was admonished that he had too big a melon for such a When the devil was sick the devil a saint was he; when the little nigger, and who replied:
