eral government, and New York and Ohio, among others, HAVE BEEN REORGANIZED in recognition of this principle; although there is still no system in the country maintaining the adequate supervision required to insure the full benefits of parole.

The Report being quoted announces the continuation of the publication of the "American Handbook of American Prisons and Reformatories," the last issue of which came from the press in 1929. The 1933 copy will no doubt show that Minnesota measures up to a high place in the practice of that principle of parole. And in that state there is no "crime wave," notwithstanding the difficulties in the way of securing work for inmates of prisons eligible to parole.

And, since 1902, there has been no money from the taxpayers for the maintenance of the Minnesota state prison. And no man goes to prison or reformatory in that state and leaves his needy family destitute.

There are other bright spots. Massachusetts, not theretofore outstanding in prison progress, modern lines of prison government, has established a new institution at Norfolk, where, as the 1932 Report says, "rehabilitative treatment, to a degree not found anywhere else in the country," is being carried on.

All modern American prisons now maintain educational classes. This is true even of some in the south, where all prisons are supposed to be self supporting and every one is, or nearly so—school studies are required—a thing not thought of below the Mason and Dixon line up to a few years ago.

Perhaps the reader does not know that in San Quentin prison, largest in the world, there is a complete educational plant, built for the purpose, within the prison walls, the only one of its magnitude and scope in about the size of that at the Oregon State college, Corvallis, some 4000 (if Corvallis has as many now), and the faculty about the same in number, 131 prison teachers. But the number of high degree holders graduating during the year is leading universities is larger at San Quentin than at Corvallis.

And every teacher of the prison school is an inmate, serving a sentence.
