

Whitehill and Myer Set Pace as Senators Win 4 to 0

GIANTS LIMITED TO FIVE BLOWS

Buddy Scores First run and Drives in two More as Solons Regain Fire

GRIFFITH STADIUM, Washington, Oct. 5. (AP) — The prodigious baseball sons of Washington celebrated their return to home grounds today by shutting out the New York Giants, 4 to 0, under the combined inspiration of Earl Whitehill's great south-paw pitching and the presence of the nation's chief executive.

Despite pre-game showers and a chilly breeze that swept the field, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, his baseball sympathies somewhat divided, joined a crowd of 25,727 overcast and befuddled spectators in watching the Senators snap out of their world series slump.

Due to weather more suited to football than baseball, the game did not approach a sell-out but any disappointment for the home club on this account was eliminated by the return to form of Joe Cronin's crew. After being buffeted and completely outplayed for two straight games, the Senators gave a dashy, peppy exhibition on their own battleground. They belabored fat Freddy Fitzsimmons, the Giants' veteran knuckle-baller, for a three-run lead in the first two innings and then coasted along confidently to their first victory behind Whitehill's masterful left-handed strategy.

Whitehill, the top-rank member of the Washington staff this year, held the heretofore rollicking and rampant Giants to five well distributed hits, including Travis Jackson's bottom double. The Senator southpaw had superb control, allowing only three runners to advance as far as third base and thoroughly throttled the Giants' big clubbers. Twice he fanned the mighty "Little Me" Ott and in a circle he retired Manager Bill Terry on a pop fly with men on second and third.

Altogether it was a great day for the Senators as they put themselves back into the world series fight. They looked more like champions than at any time so far, thanks to Whitehill's masterful control. They got the batting breaks, too, for the first time as Buddy Myer, "goat" of the first game with three errors, led today's attack with two singles and a double. The Washington second baseman started the first run which proved to be sufficient, and drove in two more for good measure.

The Giants had no alibi whatever. They still hold command, with a two-to-one lead in the series, but they are not the team they were when they shot the works tomorrow with their ace southpaw, Carl Hubbell, who subdued the Senators in the opening game. The loss of today's game disassembled Terry from taking any chance of regaining the confidence and control of the Senators, Monte Weaver, the former University of Virginia professor and a fast-ball right-hander, is slated to pitch.

The Senators, after a brisk "pep talk" by their manager in the clubhouse, came out with so much vim and vigor they had the pudgy Fitzsimmons on his heels and the crowd on its feet yelling at the very outset. As it turned out, the game was decided when Buddy Myer started off with a brick single to left, Goose Goslin doubled against the right-field wall and two runs scored on Cronin's infield out and Schulte's double in right field.

Doubles by Bluege and Myer in the second inning produced the third tally. Bill Terry, who skinned along the foot line, Bluege's into left field and Myer's past first base.

Fitzsimmons settled down for the next five innings but before yielding to Pitcher Hitter Peel and Relief Pitcher Bell in the eighth. The Senators, who collected nine hits, did not threaten again until the seventh. Sewell's scratch single through Ryan's legs, a stolen base for the Senator catcher due to a poor throw by Mancuso in an attempt to nip Sewell off first base, Whitehill's infield out and Myer's third hit accounted for the final run.

F. R. ROOTS FOR GIANTS, SOLONS

Allegiance Divided; Tosses Out Ball, Applauds Good Play on Both Sides

WASHINGTON, Oct. 5. (AP) — President Roosevelt, serving in the divided role of rooting for his cabinet and White House staff who were sitting nearby.

Arriving a few minutes late in a light rain, the president was greeted with a roar of cheering from the stands as the band played "Hail to the Chief."

No sooner had he taken his seat than the sun began to shine brightly.

"The president brought the sun," commented a member of his party.

Handed a new ball of the snappy American league variety the president rubbed it a few times and, with a smile, shouted to the group of Washington players that had gathered to grab the memento.

"Are you ready—are you ready—let her go."

The ball sailed over a dozen heads about 30 feet into the hand of Heinie Manush, Washington leftfielder, who snatched the souvenir away in his pocket.

The president then settled back comfortably to watch the game, smoking several cigarettes from a yellow holder.

He laughed heartily when a stray pigeon settled down in the infield in the sixth inning. It remained there and elsewhere on the field for the rest of the game.

In the president's immediate party were Stephen T. Early, a secretary; and Mrs. Early; Marvin H. McIntyre, another secretary; Rudolph Forster, chief of the executive staff; Commander Ross T. McIntire, naval physician; Miss Paula Tuohy, of the White House; and several other guests.

"It was a good game," the president observed after arriving back at the White House.

BATTLE FOR SANITY IS LOST BY WRITER

VINITA, Okla., Oct. 5. (AP) — The battle was over today for Mario Marion Marie Woodson, 54, author and news writer who had spent most of the last three years in a struggle for sanity locked inside the eastern Oklahoma hospital here.

His death was a tragic anticlimax after the stirring fight Woodson had waged and won against mental disorders attending dipomania.

When a feature writer for the Tulsa, Okla., World in 1931, Woodson had friends there commit him, and while dragging his loaded intellect from the depths of illness he jotted down what he saw and experienced at the institution.

Solons' Victim

Fred Fitzsimmons, roly-poly pitcher for the New York Giants, who collided with the first really sustained attack the Washington Senators have staged in the current world series. Fitzsimmons yielded three runs in the first two innings, which proved too many in view of his mates' failure to score.

Oddie's Men Play Brown Team Today

WOODBURN, Oct. 5. — Woodburn high school's football team opens its season Friday afternoon when the Bulldogs journey to West Linn to play Paul Brown's 1933 product. This is one of the games in the Willamette valley interscholastic league contest.

The game will begin at 3 p. m. Just how good the West Linn team is this year is purely a matter of conjecture for local fans, as West Linn has not played any games yet this year.

Woodburn was in turn newspaper boy, drug store apprentice, printer's devil, reporter, and finally a baseball writer. He was born in Bonnevillie, Ind., January 20, 1877. He got his first newspaper job on the Courier Journal in Louisville, when he was hired after being considered a "pest" because of his persistence in seeking a job.

DEATH OF CUBS' CHIEF MOURNED

William Veeck Wrote Self Into Job; Grimm and Players Grieve

CHICAGO, Oct. 5. (AP) — Baseball lost a progressive and fearless leader today with the death of William L. Veeck, president of the Chicago Cubs for fifteen years.

The baseball executive died in his sleep from an almost incurable blood disease, acute leukemia. He was taken to a hospital Friday. He was 56 years old.

Funeral services will be held at his home in Hinsdale, a suburb. Burial will be there.

Although shocked and saddened, other officials of the Cubs decided that today's second game of the city series with the White Sox should be played, as Veeck, before his death had confided to his physicians that "if anything happens to me, I want the series to go on."

Charley Grimm, who was elevated from a player to manager of the Cubs in August, 1932, succeeding Rogers Hornsby, was heartbroken over Veeck's death. Other players were similarly affected.

"He was the fairest, squarest fellow that ever lived," Manager Grimm said. "He was a true friend to every man on the team. His death is a great shock to us."

Out of respect for the dead baseball chief, Saturday's game between the Sox and Cubs was ordered postponed by Kenesaw Mountain Landis, commissioner of baseball, so the players may attend the funeral.

Veeck, a former baseball writer, literally wrote himself into the job of president of the Cubs. After William Wrigley, Jr., bought the club in 1918, his attention was caught by an analytical article by Veeck, writing under the name of "Bill Bailey." Veeck was constructive in his criticism, however, and Wrigley was so impressed he called him to his office, and offered him the job of running the club.

He was named vice-president with Fred Mitchell, president as well as manager that year. The next year Mitchell resigned as president but remained as manager, with Veeck relieving him of the executive duties.

From then on Veeck introduced one progressive idea after another, and built the Cubs into one of the biggest money makers in the major leagues.

Veeck was in turn newspaper boy, drug store apprentice, printer's devil, reporter, and finally a baseball writer. He was born in Bonnevillie, Ind., January 20, 1877. He got his first newspaper job on the Courier Journal in Louisville, when he was hired after being considered a "pest" because of his persistence in seeking a job.

CURT COMMENTS

Yesterday we saw a group of boys learn a lot of football in one afternoon. We probably saw more knowledge soaked up than it had ever been our privilege to observe in process of consumption before. This occasion was the annual Leslie junior high-alumni game, though it was scarcely a formal game as the coaches were right out there in the field and nobody seemed to be keeping time—or at least the alumni thought so, quite vocally after a while.

The new edition Leslie team absorbed the knowledge and one reason the boys acquired so much was that they were so totally lacking therein when it started. And it was a "school of hard knocks" in which the boys learned by being pounded scientifically. The alumni team consisted mostly of last year's outfit, graduated in a body as so often happens with these junior high teams. The old grads had everything their own way at first; scored a touchdown in about a minute after recovering their own kick-off, and got about three more in what would normally have been the first half.

But those green kids picked up knowledge so rapidly that they made it tougher every minute for the veterans; each touchdown came harder than the last one, and after a little while the 1933 boys were making a few first downs—fans, it was an inspiring view of the creation of a football team, right there before our eyes.

Graham Sharkey says he read in the paper where one golfer killed another golfer up in eastern Oregon the other day. The story didn't say they were golfers but, Sharkey points out, they must have been because it said they got peevish over a water hole.

A Willamette sport fan was asking us the other day to explain why Oregon Normal got columns of publicity in the Portland papers and Willamette got inches. We didn't know exactly, but suspected it might go back to the time a few months ago when most of the Portland papers were booming Larry Wolfe for the Oregon State coaching job. There's just a possibility that one or two sport writers figure the Oregon State coaching situation isn't settled yet and are still pegging.

25 Seek Posts On Scio Eleven; First Tilt 20th

SCIO, Oct. 5. — Approximately 25 boys turned out for football practice this week, under the direction of Coach Francis Ketter. There are 10 lettermen back this year: Backfield, R. Quarry, Todd and B. Quarry; line, Walters, MacDonald, R. Miller, Gallagher, Sims, Trollinger and Lukenbach.

The schedule of games is still incomplete, but the first game will probably be played at Philomath Friday, October 20.

GONZAGA BOYS ARE CONFIDENT

Cripples few; Oregon State Mentor Working Hard as Tough Game Nears

SPOKANE, Wash., Oct. 5. (AP) — Undaunted by defeats in their only two starts of the season, Gonzaga university's football team, entrained tonight for Portland to meet Oregon State college in a non-conference football game Saturday.

Although they limped through practice sessions until yesterday, the Bulldogs hit their stride in Wednesday's scrimmage and appeared to be fully recovered from the battering given them by the University of Oregon Saturday and the Washington Huskies the week before. Although they refused to predict victory, the players and Coach Michael Pecarovich appeared to be highly confident when they entrained.

Bill Van Sistine, giant tackle, and Frank Baker, guard, both were on the cripple list, victims of Saturday's battering, but Van Sistine was taken along. Cullen, sophomore halfback, injured in the Washington game, was back in the lineup for the closing scrimmage.

OREGON STATE COLLEGE. CORVALLIS, Oct. 5. — Realizing that Oregon State college is faced with one of the toughest games on its schedule next Saturday afternoon in Portland when it meets Gonzaga university football team, Lon Stiner, Oregan coach, is putting the Beaver squad through a week of the hardest kind of scrimmage in preparation for the tilt.

The Gonzaga game is causing Coach Stiner and his staff plenty of worry. The Spokane team is rough and tough and has the experience of two big games against Washington and Oregon behind it, while the Beavers will be facing their first real test of the season.

Secret scrimmage sessions are the main order of practice this week. Pass defense will come in for a lot of attention, as George Scott, assistant coach who scouted the Gonzaga-Oregon game, reports that the Gonzaga Bulldogs have a flashy overhead attack. Coach Stiner expects to develop offensive power plays also during this week.

Several surprises were sprung by the Orange team in the Montana game last Saturday. Although early season indications were that the Beavers would have a weak overhead game, lacking dependable passers, several long passes were completed during the game, one of which was good for a touchdown. Norm Franklin was the boy who did the passing.

Another surprise occurred when Don Wagner, a former tackle, started at right tackle in place of Ade Schwammel, regular. While in the game Wagner displayed plenty of fight and good judgment, and Coach Stiner probably will use him as relief man for either Schwammel or Harry Field, left tackle.

POLICE SAY VIENNA ASSAILANT IS NAZI

VIENNA, Oct. 5. (AP) — A police announcement today that Rudolf Dertill, the fashion designer or bugler who shot Chancellor Engelbert Dollfuss, belonged and probably still belongs to the Nazi party, touched off new and vigorous demands for drastic action against the party.

Dertill, the police announced, had admitted former membership in the Nazi party, but insisted he resigned six months ago. The Fascist Heimwehr official newspaper did not believe it, however, and announced charges that Dertill joined the party January 16, 1932, and got a membership card the following February 2.

The semi-official mouthpiece of Vice-Chancellor Emil Fesl, the newspaper Abendzeitung, demanded an end of all "half measures" and the read eradication of all the treasonable elements in Austria.

The arrests of Nazis in all parts of the country, including one university professor and several attorneys, furnished the police with more material for investigation.
