Tragedy of Sea Recalled by Suit

Claiming that the liner Conte Biancamano passed his drifting boat in the open sea and failed to answer distress signals, David Warshauer, of Brooklyn, N. Y., is suing the Italian Line for $200,000 damagea. Warshauer and his brother-in-law, Irving Tuchyner, were picked up by Coast Guards after they had drifted for 9 days in the Atlantic, off New York, two years ago. When death seemed certain, they had made a pact that should one survive he would care for the family of the other. Tuchyner died of exposure and Warshauer hopes to collect from the shinning comdied of exposure and Warshauer hopes to collect from the shipping company in order to provide for his widow and child. The line company denied jurisdiction of the court to try the case, as well as Warshauer's allegations of unheeded distress signals.
