FLOODS NEAR CITY TO BE ALLEVIATED
Salem's flood water problems in the southeast part of town are well on the road to solution, for the state relief committee has given its okay to a flood control survey project along Mill creek. Hedda Swart, county engineer, reports.
The survey will employ 10 or 12 men and will include all of the Mill creek territory, with its smaller creek and ditch tributaries in both the city and outlying areas. During high water seasons, Mill creek and its side ditches cause considerable distress to residents in the southeast portion of the city.
The flood control work, for which the survey will establish a definite plan, has already been started, as the county took the lead this spring in constructing a dike from the penitentiary annex to the bridge. This piece of work was done first, as the Southern Pacific cooperated in allowing the county to use one of its shovels free and also donated the man power.
Presumably, the next unit of the actual control work will be done on the Davidson ditch near South 12th street.
It has been estimated termite damaged buildings in the United States to the extent of $50,000,000 during 1933.
