READING PARTNER'S SIGNALS ESSENTIAL

Echo, High Card Followed by Low Discard, Found One Useful Device

(Editor's Note: Below is one of a series of articles on contract bridge written by Mrs. W. E. Quinn, Portland Culbertson expert, who is directing The Statesman second annual bridge tournament held each Monday night at the Marion.)

Do you read your partner's signals correctly? Do you recognize the red lights telling you to stop, the green lights saying speed ahead? Signals fall into two classes—the encouraging and the discouraging. The encouraging signal is asking for that suit to be continued, the discouraging signal is asking that you discontinue that suit. We used to think of the six spot as the line of separation. Any card higher than the six was considered encouraging, any card lower than the six discouraging. The six-spot itself was the only doubtful card. This cut and dried system did not work.

What could you possibly do if the lowest card that you had in a suit was a seven yet you did not want that suit returned? Or just as puzzling, holding the A K x x you wish your partner to lead that suit, and yet you have no card with which to give an encouraging signal. Mr. Elwell solved this problem by inventing the echo. The discarding of a high card and then a low card, asking that the suit be continued.

The only trouble with the echo is that sometimes we do not have time to complete the play. Suppose your partner leads the K of which you hold Q 8 3. The 8 would naturally be played on the K. The 3 cannot be discarded or led, so the 8 must be interpreted as the beginning of an echo which could not be completed.

If you wish your partner to switch to another suit you try to discourage him by normal discarding, in other words the playing of a low card and then a high one. Partner leads the K of spades and you holding three worthless spades do not wish to continue. For example, from the holding of 9 6 3 you carefully discard the 2 and then the 6.

A very valuable method of signaling is the trump echo. If you hold three trumps, discard the middle and then the lowest, telling your partner that you originally held three trumps. Partner knows that you hold another trump, which you may use for ruffing purposes. (J 6 4 of trumps discard the 6 then the 4).

Herbert E. Barker, president of the Salem trades and labor council and member of the meat cutters' union, was elected to the executive board of the State Federation of Labor by a margin of 30 votes, Ben T. Osborne of Portland, executive secretary of the state federation, informed union leaders here yesterday in a short visit while en route to Eugene.

Barker was elected over F. J. A. Boehringer of the operating engineers and J. M. Rickman of the carpenters.

SALVATION ARMY'S HOME BEING RAZED

Structure Condemned; Rain Pours in; Hope for New Building Expressed

Work of wrecking the 40 year old building at 241 State street, which for the last 15 years has housed the Salvation Army, was started yesterday as the first step of an improvement program, in line with the Marion county modernization campaign.

For 15 years the Salvation Army workers have found it difficult to carry on their meetings in adverse weather because of the dilapidated condition of the building. The place had been condemned and during the heavy rainstorm last Sunday the school committee was "rattled out" because of the leaky roof, Captain Lewis McAllen reported yesterday. The army meetings now are being conducted at 130 Commercial street.

Lytle Bartholomew, one of the Marion county housing committee workers investigated the possibility of obtaining financial assistance for the Salvation Army but it developed loans, at this time, are being made only for home and business property renovation. It is expected that the new structures will be made next spring, at which time the Salvation Army leaders indicate they will erect new quarters.

Preparations for the new offensive of the county housing committee were being acted today with sales clerks and store managers scheduled to meet tonight at the chamber of commerce in the first public session. The meeting has been arranged by R. D. Slater, committee chairman, in an attempt to acquaint all sales personnel with the various phases of the national housing act.
