RECALLS EARLY RESIDENCE OF SALEM

There are round laugh-wrinkles at the corners of Mrs. LaFollett's mouth that 90 years have failed to eradicate. At 90 she has been observing witty, handsome and as erect as some old army general. She has retained much of the elasticity of youth, although she has partially lost her sight.

"I started housekeeping in a little house on the corner of High and Marion streets right where that fruitstand is now. There was just two little old school houses in Salem then. There were no sidewalks, no street work. The town was just a few old shacks and a few early stables. Dr. Epley was just a big boy running around town. Dr. B. L. Steeves was riding a bicycle around town and helping his mother, who ran a bakery. Taylor Rigdon was just going into the undertaking business."

There was an interval of quiet reflection as Mrs. LaFollett recalled other names of old-time friends who have all gone.

"I was born in Vermont on April 10, 1845. New England was just a forest wilderness at that time. They had no modern frills for babies then, no fancy baskets or fences. They used to set the baby out on the grass in a horse-collar. That was our baby fence."

Vermont Neighbors Believed in Witches

"My people were French. French Catholic immigrants to the American colonies. Some people in the colonies used to believe in witches in those days. I felt like shaking them! I didn't believe in them! I have had a lot of religious experience. I was a Catholic, sprinkled into the Methodist church when a girl and after I came to Salem I was immersed into the Campelite church. That's what they used to call it—Campelite. I was baptised in the old brick Christian church. Pastor Messick was helpful."

All life has been varied and colorful with Mrs. LaFollett. Life and death, joy and sorrow have all enriched her. A firm believer in the value of a spiritual life, her experiences have not left her embittered.

"Life has taken much but it has also given much," she stated. "I lived in several states. For a while I was in Butler county, Kansas. I ran a tailor shop there. I was always a working woman and I liked to sew. I liked to be with and wear a lot of pretty clothes. I had some Free Methodist friends who didn't like that. They told me I should not wear so many buttons and so much color. I told them I intended to look nice, and I did."

Mrs. LaFollett was first married at 18 years. After coming to Salem she became Mrs. LaFollett. Her health was never very good until she was 45 or 50, but since that time she has been strong and is marvelously preserved. She lives in the present

MILES LINEN MILLS OUTLOOK IS BRIGHT

Activities at the Miles Linen mills so far this year carry encouraging prospects. Knitting operations are being carried on by day and night shifts, this situation holding for the past two months. Two shifts are also being operated in the twine departments, with in all 50 employees on the payroll.

Fishing nets, going largely to coast and Alaskan trade, constitute the chief knitting operation. Some markets in the central states are also supplied with the Salem product.

C. J. Peters, manager here, reports that Sam Barbour, vice-president and general sales manager of the Linen Thread company of New York, was very optimistic over conditions on the coast when Barbour visited the mill here 10 days ago.

The Salem Linen mills continue in good operation, with program being made toward reorganization according to L. C. McLeod, president and general manager.

TRANSPLANTING OF SETTLERS SOUGHT

Transplanting of settlers from the drought regions of the United States to Oregon, as outlined by D. O. Hood, state budget director, following a conference with federal emergency relief officials, will increase production in this state and at the same time restore thousands of acres of idle land to the taxrolls, Governor Martin declared Friday.

"I have been in telegraphic communication with federal officials for several days regarding the proposal," Governor Martin said, "and I am now preparing considerable data which will be sent to Washington early next week. I cannot make any further statement regarding the plan until the data is completed."

Much of the information being prepared by the executive department will have to do with the Lee-Beckman "back-to-the-land" law enacted by the 1933 legislature.

Listings of suitable public lands together with other lands which have reverted to the counties because of delinquent taxes also will be included, the governor said.
