Threat of Rain Throws Rose Bowl Predictions Into Turmoil

Who Benefits, Open Question

Beefy Stanford Ought to But Didn't in Game Two Years Ago

By PAUL ZIMMERMAN PASADENA, Calif., Dec. 30.-(P)-Southern Methodist and Stanford football players kept a weather eye on the skies today. There was threat of rain in the air for their intersectional grid clash at the Rose Bowl New Year's day.

While meterologists were not prepared to say what would happen January 1, they forecast rain for tonight or tomorrow and unsettled conditions the next day. Possibility of a soggy field and, in the California parlance, "slight precipitation," had a tendency to throw the whole Rose tournament game setup into a slight tur-Scalpers Downcast

There was considerable conjecture as to how a slow field and "liquid sunshine" would affect the two teams, and even more consternation among ticket scalpers who had hoped to clean up on the ducat market tomorrow and

General opinion prevailed that Stanford, with its ponderous line and a team 11 pounds to the man heavier than the Mustangs, would gain the advantage in case of rain, since Coach Matty Bell's team depends on passes and fast breaking running plays.

On the other hand, the invading Texans thoroughly demonstrated this season especially in their game with Texas A. and M. that Goddard and Grayson Are Adams' Boys Get But Two they could throw passes in the rain and that Bobby Wilson, star halfback, also could run on a slow, slippery field.

Boys Not Mudders Stanford's team never has been classed as a mudder. It lost to Columbia on a wet field here two years ago as the outstanding example of its reactions to a soggy

Eight players on that team are back in the Rose Bowl this time, including Bobby Grayson, the all-American fullback who put on one of the greatest one-man exhibi-tions the bowl has seen by piling up 160 yards.

Yet the fact remained that Columbia, outweighed almost as much as Southern Methodist will. be, scored the only touchdown of
