"Hemess Pass" Name Claimed

Writer to American Guide Officially Says Santiam Wrongly Designated

PORTLAND, March 7.—That Santiam Pass should be named Hemess pass is the claim of E. Hemess in a letter received by the state office of the American Guide, WPA writers' project. The text of the letter follows:

"I take pleasure in giving you what information I can, concerning the history of the discovery of the Breitenbush springs and also the Santiam highway."

"I am the only one living who can give a true report, as all who lived at that time that were cognizant of the fact have passed to the great beyond. My brother, long departed, and I made the trip over Santiam pass, should be Hemess pass, in June 1877."

"We were on the trip for 10 days making the trip we carried our blankets and provisions on our back, having no tent we had to provide cedar bark sheets to sleep under. Building camp each day prevented us from traveling a greater distance each day. I have since been able to make the distance some 30 miles further in 8 hours."

Springs Discovered

"The Breitenbush springs were discovered in 1875 by Judge John B. Wahdour and Henry States in 1875 or 1876."

"My brother L. T. Hemess was employed to go with them on that discovery trip but something prevented it."

"Lewis Breitenbush camped at the mouth of this stream about 1879, with Charley and Bill Thomas."

"While in camp he told his company about the usefulness of a bat's eye. He said if you were to put a bat's eye under your tongue you could travel anywhere in the darkest night without a light. The boys named the stream bat's creek which it carried for several years when it was changed to Breitenbush and the springs naturally took the creek's name. I hope you will have this properly recorded in history. I don't expect to stay here many years to correct erroneous reports. If I can make a few more trips to the mountains I will probably have passed the 100 mile post. I am nearing the 87th now."

"If there is any information in regard to the history of this country I will be glad to help you."

Real Wages Over 1929 Mark, Held

SEATTLE, March 7.—When measured by the current cost of living, real wages paid in the sawmills and logging camps in the Douglas fir regions of western Oregon and western Washington are higher than at any time in the past ten years, according to a study made by the West Coast Lumbermen's association which was made public today. "The bases for the study," the association stated, "were the indexes of the United States department of labor and average wages as reported both to the department of labor and industries state of Washington, and to the association."

Using the year 1913 as 100, the United States department of labor studies show that the cost of goods purchased by wage earners and lower-salaried workers, including food, clothing, rent, fuel and light, house furnishings, and miscellaneous, ranged from 181.3 in December 1925, to 138.5 in October 1935. In June 1929, it cost $17.23 in then current money to buy as much goods of these kinds as could be bought for $1.00 in the year 1913. In October, 1935, the same goods cost $1.408 in 1913 dollars.

Living Cost High

In June, 1929, the lumber industry of the west coast was paying an average wage of 65 cents per hour to all workers, with the cost of living at 172.8. In October, 1935, the west coast lumber industry was paying an average wage to all workers of 62.5 cents per hour and the cost of living stood at 140.8, a reduction of 32.0 points, or 18.5 per cent.

Using June, 1929, purchasing power as 100 per cent, the association found that the present dollar, in terms of real wages, is worth $1.185. The 62.5 cents wage of October, 1935, paid by the west coast lumber industry represents a real wage of 74.06 cents per hour, probably the highest real wage ever paid by our industry.

"Using the dollar index of 1929 as 100 per cent, the association found that in a 40-hour work week October, 1935, the average employee received in real wages $29.62 compared with $17.53 in June, 1929, (average 31 hours weekly), and with $31.68 in June, 1929, while working a 48-hour week."
