Harada Describes Japanese Gardens

Artistic Use of Rocks Is Typical, Scholar From Orient Tells Group

Rocks are as important to Japanese gardens as flowers and shrubs, according to the talk given by Jfo Harada, distinguished Japanese scholar, brought to Salem last night by the Woman's club, Arts league and A.A.U.W.

They are not the rough broken stones found in American rockeries, but rather pebbles or perhaps immense boulders which centuries of erosion have moulded into unique shapes or polished to a high luster.
Stones have been admired in Japan since the seventh century, Mr. Harada said, for their suggestive lines, their solid reality and their enduring quality.

Use Now High Art
Their use for artistic purposes has become a high art. Some are arranged in sand on trays to represent landscapes, with seasonal changes traced in the sand. Rocks of unique shapes will influence the Japanese admirer to deep reverie and contemplation.

The arrangements of different types of stones in gardens may represent landscapes or allegories. Great expense and trouble are undertaken to transport rocks from distant parts of the country.
The Japanese have developed gardens to emphasize the tranquility and solitude of nature, a place where they may commune with nature and the infinite, the speaker concluded.
