Toyohiko Kagawa Viewed as Sincere, Zealous Christian Worker and Real Leader of Thought in His Homeland

By JACK BELLINGER

Toyohiko Kagawa—first only the name of a great and much admired Christian leader of Japan—then as he appeared on the platform of the Portland church where he spoke, the living man, prayerful, reverent, kindly. Then, addressing the thousands who crowded the Portland public auditorium to hear him, he became a dynamic, creative individual. And finally, one whom a few privileged and fortunate individuals who were permitted to break bread with at a dinner before he departed on his train for Seattle; kindly, friendly with a deep, rich personality.

Such was the man. It was he who said, after his talk at the auditorium that night, "Let us gather a few of your student friends together and eat someplace." The hostess that evening was Miss Dorothy Nyland, director of student activities of the Wesley Foundation at the University of Oregon, to whom Kagawa addressed his willingness to spend a few moments with a small group. She had met him last summer in Japan and again since his coming to America. Willamette university and University of Oregon students and others interested in the man and his work were in the group that heard him.

Rejected Wealth

The life story of the scion of a wealthy Japanese family who, in the face of death by tuberculosis, rejected wealth and idle comfort to live in the slums and become a friend of the laboring class, who out of his knowledge of living conditions among the poor was called upon by his government to lead in the reconstruction of the city of Tokyo following the great earthquake of 1923, and later continued preaching Christianity to the Japanese people and organizing cooperatives—and his "Kingdom of God" movement — that story was told by Kagawa as he addressed his listeners at the auditorium.

The five ideas that Christianity has given Japan, Kagawa told his audience, are purity, the spirit of peace, the spirit of service, the spirit of respect to labor, and the true idea of personal piety.

"Jesus Christ was once a carpenter. We must respect labor and the laboring people. Our labor party is against communism," he emphasized.

"The young men in Japan are eager to get spiritual uplift with the message of Christianity, but preaching is not enough. Unless we show them loving kindness, the Japanese people do not respond, so we organized cooperatives, mutual aid societies and the Kingdom of God movement," he said.

Seven Point Program

In the morning session at the First Congregational church, he explained his seven-fold plan for the cooperative movement in Japan, which included: (1) Purpose—Consumer's Cooperatives, (2) Order—Public Utility Cooperatives, (3) Selection—Mutual Aid Cooperatives, (4) Growth—Credit Cooperatives, (5) Exchange—Marketing Cooperatives, (6) Labor—Producers' Cooperatives, (7) Insurance—Life and Health.

Diminutive in physical stature, Kagawa is a giant in ability and strength in the face of handicaps. The trachoma that so nearly kept him from entering this country is not a visible disease, and even looking at him close up one can scarcely notice that he can hardly see from one of his eyes. He wears an inexpensive black suit, that more money may go to his work. His family lives simply in Japan on an allowance of $40 per month, the royalties from his books—and he is a prolific writer—and all money received in his behalf going directly into his work in the rural areas, in the slums and among the working classes everywhere in his country.

Human brotherhood and the love of mankind grow out of Kagawa's own life. His experience has taught him sympathy with men and women who toil and suffer, for he himself has known suffering, shame, hunger, imprisonment, struggle against disease. His doctrine, as he describes it, is one of loving kindness.
