

Building Good In Northwest

Salem Record Ranks Well Up on List; August Beats Year Ago

(By the Associated Press) Reflecting brick activity in small home building, Pacific northwest building permits rose generally in the January-August period of 1936. In some cities the total value of building permits for the eight-month period exceeded the total for last year. Bellingham reported it was enjoying the biggest building year since the peak year of 1928. August permits were more than double those of a year ago and for the eight months period were $546,202, compared with $116,582 for the same period in 1935. Spokane building permits were more than doubled over the eight months with their value totalling

$2,566,102, compared with $1,026,094 a year ago. August permits totalled $174,380, compared with $145,840 the same month a year ago. Hoquiam permits were up for the period but showed a decrease from July to August of this year. Aberdeen reported permits totalling $14,000, the largest for any month since April, 1931. Tacoma permits for the eight months were $842,231, above that of last year's period but dropped in August compared with July of this year. Not one permit for a new building was issued in Wenatchee during August and permits for the month were $4,443, the fourth lowest month of the year. Walla Walla building permits were $23,859, about $5,000 below the month last year but above the average. Salem, Ore., experienced a record month with values of private construction setting a new all-time mark of $166,021 compared with $26,482 for August, 1935. The eight months total was $1,445,178 compared with $238,686 for the same period a year ago. Yakima reported a decrease from July to August but an eight-month value topping the total 1935 value. Portland building permits in August involved expenditure of $589,545, the peak for the summer.
