Trombone's Derby Tossed High For Vic Meyers; Makes No Speeches and Is Nominated With Record Majority

SEATTLE, Sept. 10.—(AP)—They snatched the derby off the trombone and tossed it to the ceiling in honor of Vic Meyers today.

For he beat the tom-tom, flipped the cow-bell, scuffed the zither with a whisk-broom and captured the democratic renomination for lieutenant-governor with probably the largest number of votes ever recorded a candidate for the post in state history.

He received more than the total vote cast for his 29 democratic and republican opponents and five times that of his nearest competitor. He led all candidates for state and national office in the number of votes received.

As the northwest's best known orchestra leader, Meyers was "bitten by the political bug" in 1932 when newspaper reporters jested him into running for mayor of Seattle on a platform involving a hostess on every streetcar, cracked-ice on midnight streetcars and flowerboxes on water-hydrants.

He lost the mayoralty election but in the state primary and general elections he was swept into the office of lieutenant-governor.

For preparation for this week's primary, however, Meyers had turned serious. He didn't make a single speech.

"It may sound funny, but it's true. People like music better than they like speeches. Most of the speeches didn't mean anything. Instead I sat down to the piano. Jack Bain, my musical campaign manager, stood beside me. I played, he sang, and they liked it."

Laugh Boomerangs

"We went all over the state. We went places that no other politician thought of visiting.

"That Indian village where I played the tom-tom? Oh, they (his opponents) laughed when I found out the Indians weren't registered. But who's laughing now?"

"I made one speech once. That
