The Business Girl Looks At Clothes, Costs And Contour

The business girl's clothes problem is an entirely different affair than that of the woman who stays at home. (Or shall we say manages the home?) The whole day, and often the evening's costume must be planned in the morning, dress, shoes, hat and bag must be suitable for work and entertainment.

Of course we in Salem are fortunate in living close enough to home, for a hurried trip to change if there's something really important planned for evening. The average business girl will make her biggest clothes investment if she concentrates on suitable attire for her place of business. The stenographer must buy clothes that stay in press no matter how much sitting she does. A teacher's problem is for a stand up dress, and in the high school she's being subjected to the critical gaze of very clothes-minded girls.

Tailored clothes are the best all around bet. Take a look at the best dressed business woman on the street, in the office or store and you'll find that she's wearing conservative colors, expensive looking clothes (perhaps because of good taste rather than actual cost) and that her whole ensemble is completely harmonious.

I saw one outfit on a young business girl that was in good taste, yet not at all expensive. A decided blond, this young lady wore a green and a brown plaid short coat, white coarse knit sweater with a brown scarf at the neck, a bright green skirt and brown shoes. She wore no hat.

One woman of more mature years looked just as well perched on the steel of a lunch counter as she did a few minutes later on the street. Her's was a more expensive ensemble as easily topped the costume, a dark red blouse was worn under a black tailored suit. A smart red velvet flower on the lapel, reflected the color of the blouse.

Another costume for office women, of a different type but equally practical, is the figured silk dress. A small figure on a background of brown was worn with a tan coat and brown hat. A gray suit worn with rust blouse and hat makes an effective ensemble as easily for street or office wear.

White neckwear, when it's of a tailored type, and very stiff and hard, adds life to an otherwise dark costume. Scarves are handy too, and a good introduction of color to the ensemble, and variation of scarves will make two or three costumes from one outfit.
