Style-Smiles --- by Gretchen

"Well, anyway, I didn't burn the coffee." While toast and bacon go their sorrowful ways from inattention, little house frocks this year suffer no such neglect. Such a heap of thought and talent has been lavished on styling and designing for the cotton family, it no longer feels like a poor relation of the silks and satins. From an infinite variety, we've selected the photographic print above for your delectation today. Not the flowers alone, but the sunlight and shadow of your kitchen garden are printed, natural as life, on fresh, cool cotton. And, with a fig for economy, the pretty stuff gathers a wide yoke into tireless shirring all 'round, and sleeves into veritable balloons. Tiny buttons trip down from a narrow neckband to an upward curving waistline. Ribbon ties are born in the seams of the front panel to grow into a great big little girl's sash bow in back.

French Recipes Provide Meatless Main Dish For Lenten Meal

THE French know their shrimp and have many good recipes useful in American home cooking. Egg and shrimp Benedictine is a good suggestion for main dish now that eggs are comparatively low and Lenten season demands an extra meatless meal each week. Wet pack shrimp have only been in western markets for a few years but are moister and more delicate in flavor than the dry pack.

Mass Arrangement Attractive and Easily Made

THE principles which govern flower arrangements may seem obscure to the novice in this art. One term used often by writers on arrangement is mass. Just what does a mass arrangement mean to the amateur flower lover, who makes arrangements for her home with only good taste as a guide? A mass arrangement is one which comprises many flowers, closely packed together into a design which reveals little background through the flowers. It contrasts with a line arrangement, which depends for its effect upon few flowers, and is distinguished by an outline which is open and reveals a background of wall or other object. The line arrangement has been most popular among specialists recently, both in the Japanese manner and the modern, especially the latter, in which rhythmic arrangements are possible to fit in with the many extremes of the modern idea of decoration.

The mass arrangement is still practical and agreeable to those of us who appreciate the fine beauty and fragrance of flowers. But to those who are overmuch inclined to practice this type of flower setting, a few precautions are in order. The mass arrangement is inclined to be heavy, and forms a solid bank or object of color, and thus should be set only upon a solid support. Although a line arrangement for two or three flowers gracefully set in a low bowl might be attractive on a spinning occasional table, the same table would look grotesquely inadequate for a heavy container of roses or snapdragons. The centerpiece for the dinner table offers the most inviting situation for a mass arrangement. Here the onlooker has a chance to see the flowers at close range and see just what the arrangement is composed of, and of course the dinner table is sufficient support. Another thing to watch out for is the spotty appearance of the mass arrangement. This is true only when using several types and colors of flowers. It is best to group types of flowers together, so they form a coherent mass in type and color, as several different flowers grouped in a haphazard manner are likely to produce a checkerboard effect. Containers are important. Choose one which is large enough to hold the flowers, and will give the appearance of weight. A transparent glass container, even though it may be of solid substance, is not always suitable, because the stems are visible and might give the impression of flimsiness. In alternate layers. Put the brittle layer on top. Pour 1/4 cup lemon juice over the contents of the dish, and bake at 325 degrees (a slow oven) for 1 hour.
