melancholy strains of "The Last Round-Up."

There was yearning in the tune, and beneath its beauty, a deep sadness.

If one of them were to cross the Great Divide before the other! Tears sprang to her eyes, for even in the first bloom of love is an underlying strain of pain. "To love is to suffer," runs the old French proverb. Luana held Jimmy tighter to her.

He said in a shaking voice: "Till death do us apart . . ."

She shuddered. The last time she had heard those solemn words was in the office of "the marrying Judge of Yuma," on that never-to-be-forgotten morning.

She lifted her head bravely. That was an old tale that was dead and gone.

"Death will not part us, Jimmy," she said chokingly, "death cannot part those who truly love each other, as we do."
