He rose with the check in his possession and went over to the counter desk and paid. Sally opened a compact and powdered her nose. She said, coolly to Dexter, "You aren't very quick on the uptake, are you!"
and shut the lid of the small golden box with a snap and got to her feet. "Come on," she ordered Dexter, "let's go—Goodnight, everybody."

Jonathan came back to the table.

"Thanks," said Sally, "for the party." And was gone, with Dexter following. The open door admitted a rush of cold snow-clean air. And Jonathan helping Rose on with her coat, said, "So that's that."

"She didn't like it," remarked Bill, lounging over to a counter to buy cigarettee, "she didn't like it at all."

A few moments later they had driven off and Jonathan was getting into his car. Setting it in motion he turned down Senator Street and saw the tail lights of Bill's little car ahead of him. He thought, what happened to the evening...? He'd anticipated it pleasantly; it was always fun, being with Rose, he liked to talk over his days with her, he had wanted to repeat to her much that Sutton had said, wanted to ask her advice.

She said, instead, "Let's go out and was away. She was alone in the house then with a baby who had altered before her terrified eyes from the rosy roundness of normal babyhood to a jerking atom with stiffened limbs and distorted features, discolored, frightening...

The car sputtered and took a rut with an almost human malevolence. Jonathan swore, urging it on. He supposed that in due course of time he had wanted to repeat to her much that Sutton had said, wanted to ask her advice.

"Heaven help the Junior class!" said Sally simply.

"Oh, Larry's all right," Dexter told her, pushing his glass aside, "he's just young and full of beams ... wait till you see him play football."

"I'll wait," said Sally and turned to Jonathan.

"Don't be silly!" he said abruptly.

"Of course I wouldn't. . . I can't imagine anything more deadly. I don't skate or ski or whatever it is that they do; I haven't any equipment. . . No, I'd a lot rather not go, even if I could take the time off ... I'm giving an imitation of a busy doctor, you see," he told her, smiling at Rose. He had forgotten Bill Lynd smiling at Rose. Shipbuilding Issues Rally Due to F. R. Proposal of Fleet Subsidy

NEW YORK, June 9-(AP)-The stock market was hit for losses of fractions to a point or so to day in lifeless trading.

Shipbuilding stocks, bolstered by the administration's proposed program for a subsidized merchant fleet, were resistant most of the day. New York shipbuilding preferred jumped 31/2 to 60 and American shiphuilding was up 11/4 to 491/4.

Enthusiasm for these issues and a few scattered specialties failed to dispel the gloom occasioned by widening of the strike areas, and the rest of the list after an indifferent start pointed downhill on small volume. Motors Hit Bottom

Giving impetus to the retreat, some analysts said, was the decline of General Motors to a new low for the year. The issue closed off 1% at 52%. Selling was prompted by strikes affecting the corporation's operations and by disappointment in some circles over sales, reported yesterday.
