

Beatty Admits He Is Always Scared

No Life Insurance to Be Had; Lion Outlasts Tiger in Scrap

Even a successful lion tamer has his troubles these days.

Take the case of Clyde Beatty who will appear in Salem Saturday, August 28 when the Cole Bros. circus gives performances at 2 and 8 p. m.

You have probably seen him amble into a cage of 40 lions and tigers armed with only a light cane bottom chair and cap pistol. Beatty says the reason he uses the chair is—it's a little protection and gives the animals four legs to chew on besides his own.

His slight, 140-pound frame is facerated by the claws of the big jungle bullies—they've done everything but kill him.

"Aren't you frightened?" . . . Put this query to him and he assures you in all earnestness that he never enters the cage without being scared to death.

"You see," he says, "you never know when they'll decide to feed on you. In my racket it's impossible to get any life insurance. This striping who dominates tigers because he has the steady glance that brings fear to them used to be a puglist. . . . 'But I like the cats better,' he reminisces. 'Pugs—they black your eyes and batter your nose. The cats only cut you into nice, clean strips.' Lion can Lick Tiger. Beatty thinks a lion can whip a tiger every day and Sunday, too. The tiger assumes an advantage in the first few moments of fighting, his wicked claws leaping at the lion like razor blades. But the tiger can take it only so long, and when his first flurry subsides, the lion mops up, never leaving until his antagonist is dead.

Livestock Exhibit Planned by FFA

Egg Feed Production Will Be Basis of Contest Again This Year

For the first time in state fair history, Future Farmers of America will include livestock exhibits in their entries for the 76th annual Oregon state fair at Salem, September 6th to 12th. Of the $1500 in premium money for the Future Farmer displays, more than $800 has been set aside for swine, sheep and cattle entries.

The egg feed production contest will be repeated by the Future Farmers this year, with each of the 43 chapters in the state allotted one pen entry of 12 birds. The production cost contest will be conducted over a seven-day period, starting Saturday, September 4, and closing Friday night, September 10. Last year Harold Schweitzer of Canby carried off honors in this competition when his dozen eggs at cost of 10.4 cents.

The livestock judging contest, another outstanding event in the Future Farmer participation, is slated for September 9, with swine, beef cattle, sheep, Holstein and Jersey classes to be judged. Farm mechanics exhibits, crops, home projects will be other displays for the Future Farmers who have their own exhibit buildings on the grounds. Earl R. Cooley, state supervisor of agriculture education, will be in charge of the displays and events for these young farmers.
