to abandon her call at Shanghai and sail at once for Japan.

In Nanking United States Ambassador Nelson T. Johnson hurried to the foreign office to lay the affair before the highest Chinese officials. (In Washington it was announced he had been instructed to make a strong protest.)

A Chinese government spokesman said negotiations were already under way in Nanking for settlement of the affair, and that Dr. C. T. Wang, Chinese ambassador to Washington, had been instructed to inform the state department of China's regrets.

Plane Shot Down: Of American Make

Japanese naval officers announced two of their seaplanes had shot down one of the Chinese planes returning from the President Hoover raid. It was found to be of American make.

The bombing came as both Japan and China prepared feverishly for battles north of Shanghai that threatened to dwarf any previous operations in the conflict for this city, now in its third week and with a death toll running high into the thousands.

The President Hoover, home-bound from Manila, was approaching Shanghai to take aboard her second group of American refugees from the war zone when she was struck.

She wireless for aid, especially medical, and the British cruiser Cumberland and two United States destroyers rushed to her assistance. The Cumberland, nearby, reached her first and the destroyers turned back.

The British cruiser's surgeon assisted the liner's doctor in emergency operations to save the lives of two seamen.

On orders of Admiral Harry E. Yarnell, commander in chief of the United States Asiatic fleet, the President Hoover steamed for Kobe. The same orders were given the Dollar liner President McKinley, which was close behind the Hoover.

Americans Booked To Leave Must Wait

That meant disappointment for 350 Americans booked to leave Shanghai by the Hoover and 176 more who had passage on the McKinley.

Fresh Japanese troops arrived, meanwhile, in the Yangtze river's broad estuary north of Shanghai and were landed along the south bank of the Yangtze, which Japanese leaders intend to make the starting line for a drive to smash all Chinese resistance in the Shanghai area.

Military authorities estimated the Japanese soon was 90,000 men ashore in this area to be hurled against the half million Chinese, many of them in German-trained divisions, believed to be concentrated around Shanghai and further inland toward Nanking.

Information from Captain George W. Yardley, the Hoover's skipper, showed the bombers struck as the 21,900-ton liner was anchored 50 miles below Woosung, at the confluence of the Whangpoo, Shanghai's seaward outlet, and the Yangtze.

Captain Yardley had planned to remain there until morning, then proceed to a point eight miles offshore from Woosung for tenders bringing Shanghai passengers. He had decided not to endanger his ship by taking her even to the mouth of the war-churned Whangpoo.

Captain Yardley said he had begun an investigation of the bombing. He did not disclose immediately the names of the seven wounded men.

Is Second Attack On American Vessel

The bombing of the liner was the second attack on an American ship near Shanghai in the undeclared Shanghai war. The cruiser Augusta, fleet flagship, was struck by a shell August 20; one seaman was killed, 17 wounded.

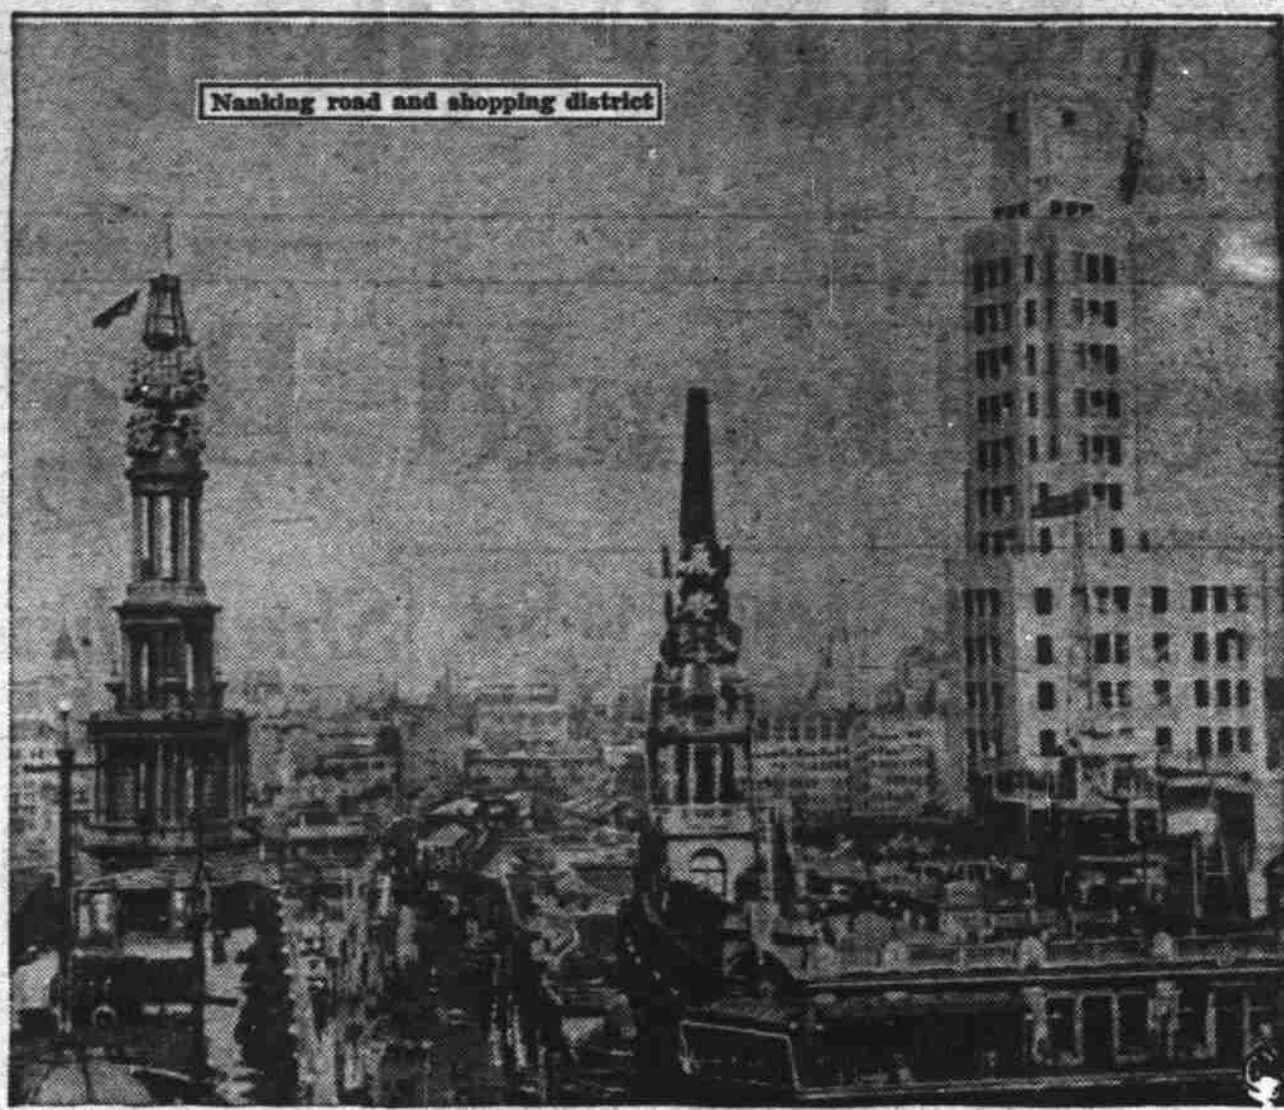

The Hoover affair also followed closely the grave wounding of the British ambassador to China last Thursday by Japanese airmen on the road from Nanking to Shanghai. Today Sir Hugh Montgomery Knatchbull Hugessen, the envoy, was recovering in a Shanghai hospital, while in Tokyo the Japanese government was studying Britain's stern demand for apology and punishment of the offending airmen.

In spite of official declarations that the Chinese Soviet non-aggression pact, conclusion of which was announced in Nanking Sunday, contained no pledge of military aid, Chinese in high places professed to see in it a definite prospect of material help from Russia.

They hoped this would take the form of at least airplanes and munitions and expressed confidence it would come in the event the Chinese armies reached the point of exhaustion in their fight against Japan.

American experts on the orient said they believed the treaty contained provisions far more significant than any made public. Other observers felt one of the main reasons China made the treaty was fear that Japan might reach

ABRAMS REPORTS

On Mock Battle

"The most instructive two weeks' camp citizen soldiers ever spent," was Col. Carl Abrams' comment concerning the big mock war near Fort Lewis, Wash., in which army and national guard units of four states participated.

Colonel Abrams returned from the encampment early this week. He served part of the time as executive officer on the staff of General Pennington of the 81st brigade. During actual maneuvers he was commander of the 41st division reserve corps under General White.

This encampment was the fourth of its kind in the United States, Colonel Abrams said. A similar concentration of regular army and national guard units is arranged each year in a different section of the country.

There was no doubt in the minds of Joe and his handlers that he trimmed the British empire champion, but all agreed that Louis had an off night and didn't come up with anything resembling his usual fight.

"The greatest need of these new settlers," Duffy said, "is guidance in helping them locate on good agricultural lands by classifications of lands, protection from promoters of lands unsuitable to farming, federal loan aid in becoming established after locating on a satisfactory farm, and speeding up of reclamation and land development projects to make new farm lands available."

ing of the emergency fund heading at the request of M. L. Meyers. The item was designated the emergency and hospitalization fund but the appropriation, $5000, was not changed. Meyers declared policemen frequently took injured persons to the hospitals, leaving the hospital managements often to foot the bills for their care.

Determination to provide for eventual installation of a fire alarm box system for the city, estimated to cost $60,000, was expressed by Alderman Merrill D. Ohling. He objected to continuance of the practice of paying salaries from the special fire tax fund, which he said should be left for the alarm system.

The county health unit appropriation was allowed as requested with the exception of salary increases.

Alderman Edwin C. Goodman urged the committee to embark on a hunt for an elusive "surplus income fund" which has been shown on the city books for several years. He claimed it might amount to as much as $17,000.

Alderman David O'Hara said that the reverse might be true, that it might be found the city general fund actually was in the red. The committee by a narrow margin, however, voted down a move by Goodman enough to hire an auditor to ascertain whether or not the fund existed.
