Increase in Alcoholism

The figures given by Dr. John Evans, superintendent of the state hospital, as to the increase in alcoholism as evidenced by commitments to the hospital are nothing less than startling. The low point in percentage in commitments of men suffering from alcoholic psychosis was reached in 1926 when the figure was 3.6. Following repeal of prohibition the number rose to nine per cent in 1935, to 12 per cent in 1936 and to 19.9 per cent in 1937.

Dr. Evans was presenting no argument for or against prohibition; he was merely quoting the hospital records. It is for students of the problem of alcoholic control to study the statistics and draw their conclusions. And what other conclusion can there be save that the immediate use of intoxicating liquors is on the increase? The fact of increase in consumption is apparent from the larger volume of business the state liquor stores are doing. The hospital figures prove that an increasing proportion of consumers are becoming intemperate.

The state is in the business of vending alcoholic liquors. It uses profits from the trade to finance poor relief and old age pensions. But it is called on also to maintain the derelicts and insane who are the "by-products" of the liquor trade. Taxpayers can see the reports of money profits in the state liquor business; they do not see the losses in increased insanity, crime and pauperism and in debility of victims who do not get so bad as to become public charges.

The first effort under the Knox plan was to put the boot-licker out of business. He doesn't operate now on an extensive scale except among city jointists. But no positive effort is made toward public education in the dangers of alcoholism. Instead all the emphasis through private advertising is to stimulate consumption. State control is imperfect unless it works actively in the direction of cutting down consumption in the interest of a stronger manhood and womanhood. Unless this is done the state will reap a sorry reward in cirrhosis of the liver and dementia.

University Overcrowding?

President James B. Conant of Harvard would cut down the number of students admitted to universities and at the same time provide more generous scholarships to young people in the lower income levels. Dr. Conant says "It seems evident that we are in danger of reaching the condition already so acute on the continent of Europe where the problem of unemployment in the learned professions demands attention even in countries racked by political and economic troubles." He cited the fact that in this country, in spite of the weeding out process in medical education, the annual supply of young doctors is 60 per cent greater than the loss to the profession by death. Last year Harvard adopted a scholarship plan for admitting a limited group distributed from states all over the union, with the object of making university education possible to the most competent despite their possible lack of finances.

The problem of overcrowding in the learned professions is not new, and there is an apparent effort to stem the tide of annual increase in such professions by stricter educational requirements and more severe examinations. In part this is prompted by desire of older practitioners to limit competition and in part to prevent unethical practices which grow up where professional men find difficulty in earning a living unless they cut corners.

The day is past when persons can get a college degree and use that as a passport to fame and riches. In some lines of endeavor the extra college years may not be of much economic value, the youth might be better off serving his apprenticeship in a vocation. High schools now offer work which a century ago was of college grade; and a good high school education is adequate for self-support, insofar as education is a requirement. From a cultural standpoint the college training is of great value; but too many people make indifferent successes in professions while they might have won better material rewards in the trades.

Search for Senator

King's horses and king's men rallied to help the governor pick a successor to Frederick Steiwer as US senator. The task was not one of the governor's choosing. It is said on good authority that the Steiwer resignation was taken up with the governor some months ago and the governor sent word back urging the junior senator to continue in office. The political involvements in the appointment are numerous. With the prospect of a campaign of his own for reelection the governor (or his friends for him) must take care not to make a bad choice. There is the saying that in making an appointment a governor creates several enemies and one ingrate. Plainly the governor wants to avoid any such calamity. His embarrassment is increased by the hostility of the left wing element in the democratic party which accuses him of unfaithfulness to the national leader. To pick an out-and-out conservative, like Evan Reames of Medford for instance, would be to invite wrath from his foes within the party. Despite the fact the governor seems to enjoy such antagonism his political advisers may be a little more sensitive on the matter than he is.

Then there is the complication of the approaching primaries, with many showing ambition to be the first democrat to be elected senator since George Chamberlain in 1914. To pick one of these would be to give him a head start in the race for the full term, and that would bring on reprisals from all the others. So the governor is searching for a one-year senator. He can find him without doubt, because the honor is great and the pay pretty good as Oregon wages go.

Of this the state may be certain, as Fred Steiwer said, the governor will not make an "irrational" appointment. He will not pick any man with a bad record or any one who is not capable of giving the state honorable service. There is solid comfort in that fact.

Coast Foreign Trade

Foreign trade showed a marked increase on the Pacific coast last year. The total of exports from the five customs districts of the coast amounted to $365,691,000 for the first 11 months of the year, as compared with $263,630,000 for the same period in 1936. Imports gained, though not in the same degree, rising from $176,286,000 in the 1936 period to $208,308,000 in 1937, first 11 months.

Oregon carries the lightest volume of foreign trade, of the three western states. Its total of exports for first 11 months of 1937 was $23,724,000 against $18,855,000 for 1936; and of imports $10,064,000 in 1937 and $8,262,000 in 1936. Washington had $84,574,000 exports and $37,939,000 imports for the 1937 period.

The long maritime strike reduced the figures in 1936 which may explain part of the increase. There is a world market for Oregon lumber, wheat and flour, fruits, canned fish, pulp and paper, and scrap iron. We need to push foreign trade aggressively; and that means we must be ready to accept imports in exchange.

AFL and CIO troubles at San Pedro are basis of a threat from Harry Bridges to life up the shipping on the Pacific coast. If Harry gives the order we may expect Mr. David Beck's teamsters to countermand it in Seattle. Beck's teamsters are versatile: they drive trucks, operate warehouses, brew beer, organize the automotive trades, so they ought to be able to longshore. By virtue of his strong arm methods and his affiliation with the Seattle big business people Beck will probably use the Bridges' strike, if it is called, as a means to crack Bridges' power in the northwest.

Bits for Breakfast

By R. J. HENDRICKS

Glen O. Holman, 1-29-38
well known native of Oregon; writes of his visits to historical places:

(Concluding from yesterday.)
Former Governor T. T. Geer's book, "Fifty Years in Oregon," commencing at page 350, had the quoted words that follow:

"When the legislative session of 1891 met in January of that year I was a candidate for speaker of the house. . . . There were few obstacles in the way of my success. R. H. Hays of Tillamook was chosen clerk, Frank Davey assistant clerk. . . . Glen Holman was the reading clerk for the session of '91, as indeed he had been for many sessions before, and he had a most remarkable memory as well as a splendid voice for that purpose."

"That was before the day of the typewriter, and as all the bills and resolutions were written in long hand, and usually by their authors, samples of handwriting drifted up to the clerk's desk that would often put a crimp in that officer's tongue."

"But Holman could read anything that even looked like writing and get away with it in pretty good shape. He never stalled. If he came to an obstacle in the way of a scrawl across the paper, he named it and went on without any hesitation whatever. It was one of his boasts that he had never yet found a specimen of writing that he could not decipher with ease."

"One day a member who intended to introduce a bill to prohibit the killing of certain kinds of pheasants, except at stated times of the year, handed it to me in advance to get my opinion on it. One section was something like this:

"It shall be unlawful to kill or have in possession, except as otherwise hereinafter provided, any ringnecked pheasant, silver pheasant, golden pheasant, copper pheasant, green Japanese pheasant, Reeves pheasant, scholmering pheasant, etc."

"In this last word I saw an opportunity to have some fun out of Holman and asked the member to let me write the bill, telling him my purpose. I wanted to write the word 'scholmering' in such a way that Holman would be baffled."

"The bill had but two or three sections, and it was soon done. I had let a dozen members into the joke and they were ready for a laugh on Holman. As soon as the house was called to order the bill was introduced."

"With his accustomed assurance, the reading clerk began to declare its provisions to the members in ringing tones which reached every part of the chamber. I had written the word 'scholmering' in such a way that it spelled nothing whatever, only the first three letters being decipherable at all. After their formation the word flattened out into a meaningless scrawl."

"And here is the way Holman read it, while the house listened and watched to see him try to admit his defeat: 'It shall be unlawful to kill or have in possession, except as otherwise hereinafter provided, any ringnecked pheasant, silver pheasant, golden pheasant, copper pheasant, green Japanese pheasant, Reeves pheasant—or any other kind of pheasant' and he went right on with a broad smile on his face while the house indulged in a round of laughter at my failure to trap the versatile translator of duck tracks, et al."

"Holman had a wonderful memory for names, and after calling the roll of sixty members a half dozen times could easily dispense permanently with the printed form."

"He was at the reading clerk's desk in the house sessions of '80, '83, '91 and '93. One day toward the close of the session of '93 he was calling the roll for about the thousandth time, perfunctorily, as the proceedings were very uninteresting, when he came to the name of Merritt, of Jackson county, who had been a member of the preceding session."

"When Holman came to his name that day he unconsciously switched from the roll call of '93 to that of '91 and followed Merritt's name with those which had gone down to defeat, and some even were dead."

"After adjournment, in commenting upon the incident, Holman repeated, from memory, the roll call of '91 without hesitation, and thirteen years before, but with a few mistakes."

"Toward the end of the session of '91 the members began to show their impatience at any move which consumed time. . . . Although when the house adjourned in '91, every bill had been disposed of and we had two hours to spare, there was much uneasiness during the last three days concerning the fate of several measures. The ministerial union of Salem had provided a minister to be present every morning to open the sessions with prayer."

"This had always been customary and it is a very fitting beginning of the day's work. . . . Several members had privately asked me to abandon the custom during the last week, in the interest of some of the belated measures. . . . On the morning of the last day there had been so many importunities from members to dispense with the morning prayer that when Rev. Robert Whitaker, of the Baptist church, stood by my side I whispered to him while the house was coming to order, 'Cut it short,' for much of the complaint had been at the length of the sessions."
