easy, desultory conversation of old friends. Gina said, linking slim, talented fingers about the stem of her contrail glass. "What do you that heim have shared. He thought her cocktail glass, "What do you hear from Tommy? Is he coming home soon?" "No. But I have one descending upon me any day now from Port-Yet her life had been full and satis-I and. Maine. Another branch of the Tommy was Alec's young nephew. Twelve years before, Alec's sister's husband had died in Kobe, Japan, and she had come back to America with her young son. At that time, Tommy had been a shy, slender boy not quite twelve years old. Now, three years after graduating from Yale, he was doing well at a mining engineer's job in South America. Alec said, "Tommy's contract is up this month. There's a chance he may not renew it." "In that case, he would be com-ing home, I suppose." Gina knew that Alec missed Tommy more than he ever admitted, that, with the possible exception of herself, he was by far the most important person in Alec nodded. "Yes, but I don't imagine he will. And even if he did, it would be only for a month or two . . . then he'd get another job and go tearing off to the ends of the world, again. I reconcile my-self," he added quietly. "to never seeing much of him any more when I discovered he had his heart set on being a mining engineer." "All the same," said Gina, "I wish he would come back. even if it were only for a month or two." And she thought, "He would if he knew how much it would mean to Alec ... if he guessed how lonely he gets for Alec's life.

She said aloud. "Did you have a good summer? Did you stay in town or take that house on Long Island?"
