CHAPTER XXV

Within an hour and thirty minntes, Tommy knew that Alec was about to tell him that he and Carowere engaged to be married. didn't know how he knew it, he adn't known it that morning when alec telephoned and asked him to dine. But he knew it now.

So presently when Alec, after ordering the fish and the Chablis, said, "Last night Caroline and I became engaged to each other . . . " he was able to receive the announcement with a perfectly composed

They were dining at one of the most important men's clubs in the city, and Alec was, Tommy decided, by far the best-looking man in the room. He looked at least ten years younger than most men of his age; the result, no doubt, of being flat-waisted and having hair which had only begun very recently to recede a little at the forehead.

Tommy brought his mind back with an effort from thinking that Alec did not look at all too old to be Caroline's husband . . . that they would make an outstandingly handsome pair walking down the aisle of any church they happened to be married in ...

Above the fading sound of a wed-ling march, with the scent of bridal roses still making him a little ill, he heard himself saying, "That's fine, Alec. That's simply swell. She is a lovely girl and I hope you will both have a very happy life."

Alec said, "I think we shall. At least I shall try very hard to give her a happy life." Then he said, still looking very Alec's face relaxed abruptly and he laughed. "You can't imagine how relieved I am to hear you say that. You two happen to be the only persons in the world, except Gina, of course, whom I care a damn about . . . and you can see for yourself how awkward it would have been if you hadn't happened to like her."

"Well, don't give it another thought, I do like her. I like her a lot."

After that they talked of other things . . . of Gina's trip to Europe and Alec's play and the chances of Tommy's getting a decent job again.

"Which means," thought Alec, a like were more or less impersonal cheerfulness and Alec and Alec and Leerfulness and Alec and Alec and Leerfulness and Alec and Alec and Leerfulness and Alec and Leerfulness and Alec and Leerfulness and Alec and Leerfulness and Leerfulness and Leerfulness and Alec and Leerfulness and Leerfulness and Leerfulness and Le

And saying it, he thought that all to let her see how much he desired the time he had known, he supposed, her, how much more he wanted her that in the end he would go back ... than she had ever yet wanted him. And kissing her like that, he was a and everything would begin over little relieved that she was going again between them.

Three days later, Caroline went to Baltimore. The night before she left, she walked slowly about the candlelit living-room of the small house in Connecticut, pausing now had become more emotionally diffiand then to touch the polished top cult than he was willing to admit of a table, to run her fingers lightly even to himself. He preferred to beover the keys of the piano, to glance lieve that he could say good-by to for a moment into the dark depths her the next day with so little acute of an old mirror.

Alec, watching her with amused eyes, thought, "She is a funny, un-predictable child. She's saying goodby to the place, I suppose."

"You've been fairly happy here, haven't you, Caroline?" he asked. "You're a little lonely at leaving it, aren't you?"

She nodded, leaning thoughtfully against the dark curve of the piano, her dress white and drifting in the candlelight. "Yes, in a way I suppose I am. Or, rather, at the flare-up of that old emotional turmoil which had forced her to say them. It was absurd, of course, to believe that what Then he said, still looking very handsome but a little perturbed, "Stop me if I'm wrong, Tommy, but there have been times when I have thought you didn't like her. When I have thought you even disliked her for some reason. . . ."

Tommy stared at him, thinking, "This is a hell of a mess. regret because he was going to be so unusually busy getting ready to produce his new play in the fall and because he would be seeing her every weekend all summer.

The summer to Caroline was constant hours in the theatre, not nearly enough sleep, icy cold showers, the thinnest possible linen frocks because they seemed cooler somehow than silk, low-heeled white sandals a chicken sandwich and a glass of milk for lunch because it was too much effort to order anything else. It meant working harder than she the theatre than she had believed He laughed at her from across the there was to learn. It meant grow-room.
