Back From the Wars

Back from the political wars, the skipper of this column resumes his editorial duties, which have for several weeks been very competently handled by Ralph C. Curtis, news editor. Like any other vacation, the happiest part is the end, when one can get back to his job and resume his round of work.

Campaigning, we found, has changed considerably. Instead of wearing one's self out in making five or six speeches a day to large crowds in the open air, campaigning now consists in calling on voters personally or speaking to small groups indoors. To reach the larger audience the radio must be relied on. That is much easier on the candidate. He can write out his speech (if he doesn't have a ghost writer), sit down in a perfectly quiet room, and read from his manuscript. His auditors may dial him out,—but they can't talk back or heckle him. (Maybe that is one reason why candidates take to the air). Radio does have its disadvantage however. The manuscript must be submitted hours in advance, and nothing that might be suspected of being libelous is permitted. And the speaker cannot get the emotional response he does when he speaks to a living audience.

The writer found the people much less inclined to put him on the spot on specific questions of local or personal interest than he anticipated. The people were uniformly courteous; and the willingness of persons to render volunteer service was a remarkable testimonial of the interest of American citizens in government. Someone should write a glowing tribute to those who labor in political vinyards without thought of personal glory or gain but out of deep devotion to their party or to the cause or person that claims their loyalty. They are the real heroes of politics.

This is written in that period of calm, election day, which forms a restful interlude between the noise and strife of campaigning and the nervousness and excitement which attend the gathering of returns on election night. The writer wishes to say that. regardless of the result of the poll, he believes the experience of being a candidate for office is very much worth-while and that the knowledge of Oregon and its people and their needs will prove of great value in the editing of a newspaper in the capital of the state.

Loans, Prices and Wages

The impending large wheat crop prompts the president to announce his intention to loan up to $172,000,000 to wheat growers on their surplus production. The purpose is said to be to keep the crop off the market to prevent price demoralization. The method is the one which the old Hoover farm board attempted. It financed purchases to absorb the surplus and hold up prices. But any surplus depresses prices even when it is held off the market. Traders know the wheat is there, that it will have to be sold some time; so they scale down their price bids accordingly. The losses of the old farm board ran into the hundreds of millions as a result of its dealing in cotton and wheat and corn. It may be that the administration expects to invoke the AAA and slash down acreage and production next year to restore a better balance between production and consumption and then dispose of its surplus, but that is hard to predict with certainty.

The new depression thus reaches the same stage as the former: the stage of price deflation with desperate efforts made to support the price-wage structure. Copper prices dropped a full cent Thursday. Railway workers threaten to strike rather than accept a wage reduction. Lumber workers are facing the alternative of a wage reduction or mill shutdown and no employment. What, one wonders, has become of the talk of bringing prices to the 1926 level, which was the acclaimed objective in 1933. One wonders, too, about the effect of devaluing gold in 1934. Certainly devaluation has not resulted in a lasting price level, which must prove discomfitting to the economists who prophesied inflation, as well as to the politicians who anticipated success in bringing higher prices by the simple device of devaluing the dollar.

The theory of the free pricing system is under open competition supply and demand will regulate prices and wages. The natural flow will equalize the price-wage structure. There have been so many impediments to the functioning of this system, impediments by government, by labor groups seeking to hold their ground, by manufacturers and producers seeking to avoid price collapse, that the theoretical free pricing system isn't working as it is supposed to do (if ever it did). However the success of artificial efforts to sustain price structures may be doubted. The record almost uniformly is one of failure.

There can be wide prosperity on any price-wage plateau provided the relationships are equitable. It is the sudden drops and sudden increases which create inequitable relationships that cause the distress. So far in this recession prices and wages have tried to hold at former high levels. If business should recover then these levels could stand; but if it does not, then both will decline after a period of business stagnation. In our opinion there should be more flexibility in the matter of prices and wages, to make possible quicker adjustments and thus prevent the serious crises which seem to attend modern business. This would entail a great moderation of views, and no group seems willing to make concessions. People run to the government for aid; but government cannot of itself support the whole structure of business. Even the Washington administration which has been prodigal with its doles is beginning to find that out.

Project Moves Along in Congress

The launching of the great Willamette valley project received a big impetus when the bill containing an initial appropriation for it passed the house. Representative James W. Mott did a good job in handling the congressional end of the measure. Now it passes to the senate for consideration.

One obstacle in the way is the provision in the general law under which local communities would have to pay a heavy portion of the total cost. Senator McNary and others are working to get relief to the states and communities from this burden. Such relief is essential. While Oregon and the valley could pay a small part of the cost if the burden were spread over a considerable term of years, we cannot take on any load of $18,000,000 now. Senator McNary says he wants the government to carry the full 100 per cent of the cost just as it has with TVA. He is correct in demanding the same yardstick be applied to other parts of the country.

Construction of the works will occupy a good many years, but once begun it will be carried to ultimate completion. The project is designed to afford protection against floods, improve navigation, provide waters for irrigation and power if desired. It should mean the harnessing of the waters for benefit of man instead of letting them run wild to his frequent injury.

Judge Arthur D. Hay of Lakeview, in a Deschutes county case, took occasion in his decision to offer the comment that jurisdiction in probate cases and "similar matters" should be vested in the circuit judge rather than the county judge. Some counties now have this requirement, which is one this paper has long endorsed. Probate matters have become increasingly technical and involved on the legal side, and decisions on them should be made by the circuit judge instead of the county judge, who rarely is a lawyer. Judge Hay's criticism was not of the county judge himself, but of the "absurd system which requires a layman to pass upon matters which only a lawyer could be expected to comprehend." The county judge should be more of the business administrator of the county, along with the county commissioners. This load of work is important and heavy, enough to tax the time and talents of competent men without loading probate work on them too.
