There is no dodging the significance of the outcome in the Iowa primary. In so far as the democratic vote accorded to Senator Guy M. Gillette for renomination is concerned, it is not a slap at the new deal as such, for Gillette has been on most issues a loyal new dealer. But beyond any quibbling whatsoever, it is a direct slap at new deal dictatorship; by which is not meant fascism, but the presumption on the part of the administration that it can dictate to congress on all subjects and demand obedience. And that is the big issue in the democratic primaries—an issue posed by the administration itself.

Senator Gillette voted against the court packing bill. Certain administration leaders said there must be a purge of democratic senators who were "disloyal" on that issue. This Iowa vote was the first such "purge."

Iowa democrats speak only for themselves. Now we must wait more than a month for Indiana democrats to speak their piece. And then seven other states at more frequent intervals.

Fortunately for the purpose of providing a test, the issue in Iowa was clean cut. Guy Gillette is a liberal, but he is neither a radical nor a yes-man. He is a veteran of the Spanish-American and World wars, a lawyer who served in the legislature before the latest war but a farmer since then; a congressman from 1932 until 1936 when he was elected to a short term in the senate to fill a vacancy.

Congressman Otha D. Wearin who opposed Gillette also came from the farm, but he is a typical young new dealer; was keynoter of the party convention in Iowa in 1930 and assistant floor leader of the democrats in the legislature. He is an author and magazine writer. Both he and Gillette went to congress as a result of the new deal landslides starting in 1932.

Iowa is a conservative state, normally a republican state. It went consistently republican from the time of its admission to the union until 1912, when in a three-way split Wilson had a plurality, with Bull Moose Roosevelt second. In 1916 it slipped back to Hughes against Wilson, gave Harding almost a 3 to 1 lead in 1920, went 2 to 1 for Coolidge in 1924 and Hoover in 1928. Then under the influence of the depression Iowa gave Roosevelt a 3 to 2 margin in 1932 and a slightly smaller one in 1936.

There is a fair indication that L. J. Dickinson, former senator who is not to be confused with the possibly more celebrated Dickinson of Missouri; will be returned to the senate in preference to Gillette in the fall. But the big job has been done. The administration has been put in its place, so far as Iowa is concerned. Iowa democrats probably are still for the new deal, but they have spoken plainly their refusal to listen to dictation, either from Harry Hopkins or "Son James."

It seems apparent that Iowa democrats consider Gillette more capable than Otha Wearin, but that is just the point. They intend to send able men, not yes-men, to the senate.

Labor Parleys in the Open

Something brand new in the way of labor dispute negotiations was tried out in San Francisco last Friday night. Twelve thousand San Franciscans turned out for a "town meeting" in the civic auditorium at which there were speakers representing organized labor and speakers representing the "committee of 43" which was formed to attempt a solution of labor tious there. As in Portland, San Francisco's troubles are mostly the result of a CIO-AFL jurisdictional deadlock.

In addition to the 12,000 witnesses, the discussion was also heard by other thousands over the radio. There was strenuous applause for Harry Bridges, CIO leader for the Pacific coast, and polite applause for W. P. Fuller, Roger Latham and other spokesmen for the business viewpoint from the predominantly union crowd. There was some booing for these latter from the galleries, but it was plain that it did not express the attitude of unionism as a whole, and it was rebuked by some of the union speakers.

The listeners learned, among other things, that labor and the committee were already in agreement upon a number of points, including consideration for the public and anxiety for its goodwill. The speakers were courteous and fair in their remarks but they did not pull their punches; some exceedingly pointed questions were asked during the free-for-all discussion that followed the formal addresses.

It would have been too much to expect that any definite agreements or new suggestions would come out of such a meeting, particularly the first such meeting held. There was a gain, however, in the general understanding of problems, in realization brought home to more people that there were arguments on both sides and able, open-minded men to voice and to face those arguments. Labor, business and the general public undoubtedly are closer together as a result of this meeting than they were before. The meeting closed on a note of determination to bring about labor peace.

Chemical Industry Confident

While other industries have remained practically frozen during the recent series of economic ups and downs, one which has exhibited independent courage, confidence and enterprise is the chemical industry, and economic observers are predicting that because of this policy, there lies ahead of it a decade of unprecedented expansion.

The demand for chemical products has dropped along with the call for other manufactured goods, but the firms engaged in these industries have steadfastly refused to reduce their appropriations for research, with the determination that they will be ready to produce when demand does revive.

The process of developing the results of laboratory research into manufactured products for the market is a slow one, requiring on the average about five years. So any early revival of consumer demand will see the chemical industry's expansion limited largely to products already being manufactured but on which markets have not been fully developed.

However, along with such a revival, there soon will appear new products, and the indication is that these will be found principally in the cellulose field, including rayon which is still expanding, and in the undeveloped field of plastics.

There is no product in nature any more widespread than cellulose, and the chemists are finding new methods of utilizing it in a wide variety of products. Incidentally, some companies better known to the public as manufacturers of explosives and war munitions are taking the lead in these more constructive fields.

Some quite new products with great possibilities include phthalic anhydride, made from coal tar and developed into one of the most durable protective finishes known, and vinyl acetate, made from acetylene, used as a binder for safety glass.

So they want to put slot machines along all our downtown curbs, to be played, with no hope of winning, by all automobile owners who insist on parking there. We're agin' slot machines and that goes for this program too.

Strange, how many natives or former residents of Iowa bobbed up yesterday to claim connection with that noble state. Yes, we were born in Iowa too.

Sage of Salem Speculates

By D. H. TALMADGE

Why Argue?
One writer says life goes space. Another says it's slow. It merely means in either case to go on fast or slow; If life for you goes on apace, And to me seems slow to go, I guess it's better in each case That we accept it so.

A Whistle and a Memory
I am sitting in the sun chamber this afternoon, stammering peacefully. Across the roof I see in a glare of sun the hills of Polk county, also stammering peacefully. I have found in the course of many hot seasons here and elsewhere that one may stammer and be almost comfortable. When one frets and boils he and comfort are far apart.

The whistle of a railway locomotive sounds from beyond the river. A not unpleasant baritone. It is announcing the arrival of a train at West Salem on the Falls City branch. I have a sort of attraction for branch lines of railway. Probably because my early life was somewhat colored by the life that went on from day to day and from year to year on either side of a 60-mile stretch of steel rails that wound crookedly through the bottoms of two lesser streams, and joined a main line that was laid on the west bank of the Mississippi. The line hugged the bluffs closely, and the big river in its times of rampage seldom reached it.

Two trains, a passenger and a freight, traversed the branch line each day. Our train, the passenger, came down to the junction early in the evening, and the passengers, mostly ticketed for Chicago, waited an hour for the long, brilliantly lighted string of cars that was to take them to that city.

Not infrequently the seats of the small waiting room at the depot were filled with passengers, and it was on such occasions that our engineer, Charlie Brandon, and our conductor, Charlie Baxter, comedians both, gratified their natural propensity to enjoy themselves wherever they might be.

All of us were merely players, as Mr. Shakespeare said. Some of us naturally to the sad and tragic, others, like the two Charlies, run to comedy. The belief of the two Charlies is that life here and more or less unable to do anything about it and get a few chuckles as we go along. This may be good philosophy or it may not, depending upon how a person sees it.

With the sound of that baritone whistle across the river sounding in my ears, the picture comes back. The stage set. A party of bored people waiting for a train. The outer door opens, and two trainmen enter, the engineer, and the conductor, each in his working clothes. They are discussing an accident that had happened while the freight was making its way up the line that afternoon. A flatcar loaded with lumber, the ends of which stuck out several feet beyond the end of the car. The head of a brakeman about to make a couple of steps between the lumber and the boxcar ahead.

The listeners shuddered. The engineer and the conductor fell into a discussion as to where should be placed the responsibility for the accident. This discussion was presently entered into by several members of the company. This discussion, which at moments became animated, was of some length. In fact, it did not end until the whistle of the approaching Chicago flyer sounded.

The engineer asked, raising his voice somewhat, so that it might be plainly heard above the noises of departure, "What about poor Miggles, the brakeman? Was he hurt bad?"

"No," replied the conductor. "That is, the doctor says he'll be all right if there are no internal complications, which, knowing Miggles, I don't seem likely. But the back of that boxcar was wrecked. The operator at the station says he never saw a boxcar so splintered on one end as that one." Then, as the last passenger passed through the doorway, the two comedians, having invented an accident and delivered an account of it successfully, grinned at each other quite as if they had done something smart.

A comedian may be only a flat tire in the way of making an understatement laugh, but I reckon if he entertains himself acceptably his time has not been entirely wasted.

It may not seem entirely reasonable that such should be the case, but I think we find less fault with the neighbors during the hot season. The quality of the fault remains the same, but the volume is reduced by heat enervation.

Hot Weather Reading
Of course, tastes differ, but give me for hot weather reading a book by one of the modern Platos. One needs to read only a few lines in order to get a glittering thought. After getting which thought one may close the book and relax comfortably. I know a reader who got a glittering thought in the same way as he read, practically the same as a hole in a plaster, a very exceptional. I got a glittering thought in the seventh line recently. It said that the person who performs a routine duty several times, owing to an inability to remember whether he had performed the duty previously, may be suspected of being in the first stages of mental prostration, whatever that may be. However, I don't believe it simply because I read it in a book, although there may be something to it. I knew a merchant ever in the Thunder mountain country, who sometimes went back as many as three times to assure himself that he hadn't forgotten to lock the store door. It was his custom every night to transfer the day's receipts from the till to his pocket, and one night when he returned to give the door a look for the sake of his peace of mind a man stopped from the dark with a gun and took his money away from him. The man with the gun was quite gentlemanly about it. He lifted his hat with the hand in which was no gun, and said "Thanks, sucker, for coming back. You have saved me a lot of effort, which would have been useless." A Robin Hood, sort of. I reckon the merchant found it easier to remember that he hadn't forgotten to remember that he'd locked the door the first time after that.

Caught on the fly at the Friday-Saturday vaudeville at the State theatre: "It is sometimes difficult in these modern days to tell a boy from a girl by the clothes they wear, but is easy to determine which is which. When a dirty story is told, the boy blushes."

TO LAND OWNERS AND OCCUPANTS

Notice is hereby given that on the 7th day of June, 1933, the County Court of the State of Oregon for the County of Marion, duly made, rendered and entered an order declaring Marion County, Oregon, a weed control district and named the following weeds and plants to be destroyed or prevented from producing seed within said district, namely: Canada Thistle and Morning Glory.

IN THE COUNTY COURT OF THE STATE OF OREGON, FOR THE COUNTY OF MARION.

In the Matter of the Guardianship of Samuel P. Eckardt, an insane person.

This cause coming on to be heard on petition of the guardian for an order authorizing the sale of the ward's real property hereinafter described, and it appearing to the court that it is necessary to sell said real property and that it would be beneficial to the ward that said real property be sold, and the court being duly advised,

IT IS ORDERED, ADJUDGED AND DECREED, that the next of kin of said ward, to-wit: his son, Eldon R. Eckardt, appear before this court on or before Monday the 11th day of July, 1933, to show cause, if any exists, why license should not be granted for the sale of the ward's interest in said real property, to-wit: in Lot 4 Block 69 Town of North Salem, Marion County, Oregon.

And it appearing to the court that said Eldon R. Eckardt is not within the State of Oregon,

IT IS ORDERED, That this order be served upon him by publishing a copy thereof in the Salem Statesman for three successive weeks prior to said date of hearing.

J. C. SIEGMUND, Judge.
Dated May 31, 1933.

Polk Fat Lamb Show Is Slated Saturday, 18th

DALLAS—Polk county's first lamb show will be held on Saturday, June 18, at Monmouth, according to plans made at a meeting of breeders and members of the Monmouth chamber of commerce. About $50 in merchandise prizes will be awarded to breeders.

There will be two main divisions, long wool and medium wool, in which separate entries may be made for individual lambs and for pens of three lambs. Several educational events such as a wool demonstration, a lamb carcass exhibit and a 4-H club judging contest are to be special features of the day.

A breeders committee consisting of J. E. Lawrence, William Riddell, and Jack Stump were appointed to work with the Monmouth chamber committee, consisting of C. W. Price, J. H. Cady and C. Winegar, in completing the plans for the show.

W. C. Leth, Polk county agent, was asked to make arrangements for the educational feature mentioned above.

This lamb show is not for purebred breeders only but that any breeder may show, irrespective of whether his lambs are purebreds or grades. The sheep, however, will be classified according to their sire as to whether or not they are long wool or medium wool.

Wacunda Club Slates Annual Picnic Sunday At Historical Champoe

WACONDA—The annual picnic of the Wacunda Community club for members, their families and friends will be held Sunday, June 12, at Champoe park.

Julian DeJardis was brought home Sunday from the Salem general hospital, where he spent two weeks as a pneumonia patient.

Warm Dry Days Curtail Pea Crop, Grand Island

GRAND ISLAND—Thinning peaches in the various orchards of the district is now in progress. Picking in the two fields of peas on the North Wilky farm began Thursday. The two varieties are of the early season and world's record. Due to the warm, dry weather the pea picking will probably not last longer than this week.

Gas Free to All

TURNER—Gasoline was free to all comers with buckets or other containers east of town last week when a large Texaco truck ran into the ditch. The truck had before it a wrecking bar could pull it out. The driver was unhurt.
