Survey Shows new Bunch of Grads Purposeful but no Better Taught Than Those of Preceding Classes

By MAURICE MERRYFIELD NEW YORK—As the echoes of graduation speeches die away and the daily chains wilt more than 130,000 young men and women are putting away their sheepskins and starting out to try and make a place for themselves in this somewhat disjointed world. In one sense they represent the shock troops of a reserve force, comprising approximately 1,000,000 college and university students in United States, succeeding legions of whom will be coming on each year to compete with them and their elders. Interviews with representative students from a dozen different institutions of higher learning, located in different parts of the nation, yielded an interesting cross-section of youth opinion and gave me a slant on what the young men and women 1938 graduates are thinking about and hoping to accomplish. One is first impressed by the definiteness of their plans. They are not bewildered young people groping forth in haphazard fashion. Nearly every one has a pretty concrete idea of what they want to do. They realize that it may not be a clear sailing, but they are striking for a planned objective and are not starting out with the attitude of taking any job that comes along. Such a viewpoint is much to their favor. The personnel manager of a large industrial corporation recently remarked that he was much more inclined to give serious consideration to a candidate for a job if the applicant has something definite in mind rather than merely applying for any type of work. An employer prefers to hire someone who shows decision and purpose. There has been a swing from courses of the liberal arts and cultural type to studies which emphasize social and vocational values. This trend is reflected in the more practical philosophy of the 1938 graduate as compared with those who won their diplomas a decade ago. Apprenticeship system grows. At the same time, I found little evidence in my talks with various young men and women that there was any startling "new deal" such as is often reported. Many have expressed the opinion that the student of today is a much more serious individual than ever before, better posted on current political and economic affairs, better fitted to make the transition from campus to the outside world. The conversation of most of the "current crop" fails to bear this out. They may be rather more serious and practical, but this is because of their concern about getting a job. The campus is still much a cloistered world and the undergraduate is still at a considerable disadvantage when the discussion switches to social, economic and political problems. The co-eds appear to be getting a break this year. More young women graduates, according to reports from registrars and personnel bureaus, are being placed than in any one of the past four years. There is an increasing number going into teaching. For several years the trend was away from this field as young feminists sought careers in other line. Now, however, a greater number are being recruited by our educational systems. Other interests to which they are turning include radio, commercial advertising, dress designing, secretarial work and jobs as laboratory assistants or in social fields. Many are taking summer courses in commercial work, learning typing and shorthand so they may better qualify for whatever they want to do. One result of the recession and depression, especially among the girls, has been the spread of the so-called apprenticeship system. Formerly, vacation period meant just that for most co-eds—a time to loaf and play. In the past several years, however, the girl undergraduate is using the summer months to advantage by getting some kind of a job, however insignificant, in her preferred field, thus acquiring some experience and background against the time when she will really start her career.

As daisy chains are discarded and caps and gowns put away in mothballs a new crop of graduates go forth to battle the recession. Analysis of the current crop of graduates indicates that they have more purpose and a better idea of what they want to do than did those of yesteryear but are little better informed.
