Title to Money Is Suit Basis

Mrs. Fry Asks Declaratory Judgment That She Is Owner of $25,000

Mrs. Hettie E. Fry, individually and as executrix of the Daniel J. Fry estate, filed suit in circuit court here Monday against C. C. Bryant, receiver of the First National Bank in Salem, asking a declaratory judgment to the effect that she individually is owner of $25,000 paid to her by Mr. and Mrs. T. A. Livesley and the T. A. Livesley company, and that the Fry estate has no title to this sum.

The case involves the attempt of the bank receiver to collect from the estate an assessment against stock in the closed bank held by Daniel J. Fry who was its president, and another action in which Bryant is seeking to have Mrs. Fry ousted as executrix of the estate.

The $25,000 at issue figured in a transaction in which D. J. Fry was guarantor of a note given by Livesley to the Pacific National bank of San Francisco. Mrs. Fry paid the $25,000 to cover the guaranty after Mr. Fry's death, and it was later repaid to her by the Livesley interests.

Childs Explains Bank Theories

Qualitative, Quantitative Theories Said Factors in Banking Ideas

The conflicting theories of qualitative and quantitative banking are paramount factors in the national development of banking theory today, Prof. Frank Childs of the economics department of Willamette university said in an address at the Salem chamber of commerce luncheon Monday.

The quantitative theory is the newer one and involves the artificial expansion or contraction of credit and of money in circulation to stimulate business or to prevent too rapid and unhealthy expansion, he explained. The difficulty has been, he added, that the federal reserve board, though able to control these factors, has not been able to control velocity of transactions, if credit is made easy, there is no certainty that money will be borrowed, and if the open market operations committee puts money in circulation by buying securities, that money quickly finds its way back into the banks.

Ecclies is Exponent
Mariner Eccles, chairman of the board of governors of the federal reserve system, is an exponent of this new quantitative theory; Secretary Morgenthau and some others on the board favor the older theory, Childs said. The change whereby this board became responsible to the federal administration rather than to the member banks of the federal reserve system, is one reason for business uncertainty, the speaker explained, since the board's action in manipulating the rediscount rate and the required reserves of banks, may have important effect on business.

State banking regulations have been greatly tightened in recent years, Childs said, pointing to an instance of a bank being established in West Virginia with $2000 capital and without experienced bankers in charge.

Prof. Childs, a Salem high and Willamette graduate who obtained his master's degree at University of Southern California, goes to University of Minnesota under a teaching fellowship to obtain his doctorate next year, President Bruce R. Baxter said in introducing the speaker. Prof. William C. Jones will return to the chair of economics at Willamette this fall.
