Are We Educating too Many?

One-fourth of the people of the United States are enrolled in various types of educational institutions, according to Dr. J. B. Edmundson, dean of the school of education of the University of Michigan, who posed the question as to whether that is "too many" in an address at the eastern Oregon conference of the Oregon Teachers association this week at Pendleton.

Presenting points on both sides of the question, Dr. Edmundson pointed out that much of the work of this present age does not require secondary or higher education, that many students are not adapted to the courses they attempt, that students of real ability are retarded in their progress by the presence of those less gifted, that the expense, higher than that of any other country, may be unwarranted and if so, is being wasted at the expense of old age pensions, relief and other social services.

In the defense of the present educational program, Dr. Edmundson mentioned the democratic ideal of equal opportunity for all, the necessity for enlightenment in a democracy, the evident lack even with present educational facilities of an adequate understanding of public issues, the incompleteness of present general information on matters of health, vocational efficiency and citizenship, the necessity for providing wholesome and even passably useful occupation for unemployed youth.

This is indeed a question which merits thought, and with the issue once raised, there would no doubt be a large section of the population which would conclude that the community, state and nation are, as a matter of fact, educating too many persons. But it cannot be divorced from the further question as to the efficiency of present education with relation to each individual. It may be that we are trying to fit too many square pegs into round holes; that there is a different type of education, not yet developed, which will benefit the young people now struggling through courses which do not interest them and will never benefit them.

Recently, when important events were occurring hourly in Europe, were students required to sit in classrooms and delve laboriously into the doings of Caesar and Cromwell, or were they permitted and encouraged to congregate about a radio and watch history being made? Are the civics students of today learning with sufficient clarity as to make a permanent impression on their minds, the actual meaning of such terms as democracy, Americanism, free speech, freedom of the press? Are they learning enough economics to be able to spot the flaws in prevailing Utopian schemes? Our own recollection of school days brings up these questions.

It is beyond question that the present generation of adults has no over-supply of groundwork in these fundamentals of solid citizenship. Perhaps education is better today; and if so, on the hope of a more intelligent citizenship alone, is justified the fact that there are now more than six million students in American high schools today compared to one million in 1910, a million and a half in the colleges compared to less than half a million, and many more people of all ages in schools of other types.

Spy Trial Good Reading

The story of alleged German espionage in the United States, as unfolded in the trial of three suspects in New York City, makes good reading, but it is doubtful if the American people are greatly excited about it. Popular fiction and the movies have dealt at length with this business of peacetime spying, setting the locale usually in some country other than the United States. The arrests of this group some months ago and the present trial indicate its actual existence in this country.

But Germany is many thousands of miles away and there are slight prospects of any war between the United States and Germany within the period that any present information would be of value. Therefore it is true that a German spy exposure causes less concern here than a similar revelation with respect to Japan. In popular belief, at least, there is much more danger of a war with Japan.

German espionage becomes more serious however when inventions of a military nature are taken into consideration. It is reported that a number of such developments have become known to other nations, although a few important ones remain exclusive United States property. One of these is said to be the most deadly poison gas yet discovered; another is an anti-aircraft gun that is effective up to 20,000 feet. This probably does not complete the list.

Viewing the question from this angle, there is complete justification for the creation of a new counter-espionage service in the United States. We are finding it necessary to be less good-natured over this type of "invasion" as well as in regard to the invasion of foreign ideologies.

Eastman Asks Us to Be Fair

Elbert Eastman, author of the citizens' retirement annuity bill, does The Statesman the honor of asking it to be fair to him. That is something of a compliment because Mr. Eastman, in going about the state championing his bill, is not being fair to the newspapers. He charges that they are against his bill because it would hit newspaper advertising.

As a matter of fact advertising originating in Oregon would be taxed 2 per cent like any other transaction under this bill. But newspapers, in so far as their advertising revenue is concerned, would be taxed less severely than most other businesses, because advertising is a one-transaction commodity. There would be no pyramiding of that particular tax.

In Mr. Eastman's letter which appears elsewhere in today's paper, he complains that "you fellows" promised to broadcast his speech at the Salem chamber of commerce luncheon last Monday. If by "you fellows" he means The Statesman, it should be noted that this newspaper does not own nor control any radio facilities. The address of F. H. Young at the Kiwanis club the following day, also was not broadcast.

In accordance with Mr. Eastman's request, The Statesman is submitting several questions to him and affording him the privilege of answering them through this newspaper's columns, which are always open to pertinent discussion of any public issue.

The Corvallis Gazette-Times deprecates the election of Glenda Farrell as mayor of North Hollywood on the ground that she bribed male voters by "kissing them on the cheek." How—especially in North Hollywood—a voter short of senility could be swayed by any such innocuous caress from a comedienne who is only passably good looking in a homely sort of way, is more than we can see. Although Glenda is one of several movie actresses we haven't met personally, on the screen she looks, even when she doesn't act, like a young woman of good common sense. Apparently the people of North Hollywood share our impression of her.

Some confusion seems to have resulted from reference in this column Friday morning to "this week's" Colliers. The issue referred to, containing Neuberger's article on Bonneville power, was dated October 22, but as is customary with magazines, it made its appearance eight days before that date.

Bits for Breakfast

By R. J. HENDRICKS

Ben Kummer tells why he is in Rhode Island and reports on the great storm that hit that section:

Dated October 5th, a letter comes from Benjamin T. Kummer, who, regular readers will recall, recently wrote to this column telling how a poor colored man inspired the movement that brought about the completion of the magnificent First Methodist church building of Salem long a source of justified pride here. The October 5 letter, from Mr. Ashton, Rhode Island, reads:

"Since our name appeared in the 'Bits for Breakfast' column giving our address as above, many of our friends have been wondering how we happen to be here and how we fared during the great storm. First, I wish to say we are safe and sound. No misfortune befell us in any way.

"We left our home at Brownsville, Oregon, May 31 a little before 4 p. m., making Newport our first stop, for when we started east we went west all the same as 'wrong way Corrigan.' We stopped at Tillamook to transact some business and stayed overnight at Hoxley, where we had a very pleasant stay. We were in Kirkland; visited friends and relatives.

"In eastern Oregon we drove through the Grand Coulee to the site of the dam. At Butte we again visited friends. Only one mine in operation. Butte has a nice park, trees, grass and flowers—quite a contrast to what it was years ago.

"We drove through the Yellowstone park in the north and the coast by Cody way. Snow drifts higher than our car; some roads not yet open. A lot of improvements in the way of roads and camps since we were there 13 years ago.

"Down the Shoshone canyon to Cody is a beautiful drive. At the dam, which is one of the highest in the country, we saw a great change. Thirteen years ago the water was spilling through the crevices in the rock in great quantities. But now the engineers have discovered a way to stop it.

"Through Graybull, Worland and Buffalo—up Ten Sleep canyon over the Big Horns, over 9,000 feet high; some drive, with the road still soft at and near the summit.

"In northeastern Wyoming, ten miles off the main road, is Devil's Tower, which is well worth your time to go to if you pass that way.

"Here we saw the first real prairie dogs I have seen since my first trip across the continent in the nineties.

"Everywhere we saw good grass, even in western South Dakota. Poor old South Dakota! Abandoned farms, dilapidated and vacant houses. Only a few of the wealthiest and best farms have been able to stand nine years' drought.

"At Huron and on south things looked much better. Even in rich Iowa the dry weather left its mark. We visited a few days at Sioux City and Smithland.

"From here on across the central states it was too wet. Farmers trying to cultivate corn when it was too wet; at places water standing or running through the fields.

"In Indiana we again visited our kith and kin; then on to Washington, Pa., where we made a short stop. Washington is 80 miles south of Pittsburgh.

"From here we had an angle north to New York, and a class found difficult driving though this industrial and mining country.

"The new roads through the east are good, but the old ones are rough, crooked and high crowned, out of one town into another; with speed limits as low as 12 to 15 miles per hour, one does not make very good time.

"Finally we arrived at the little village of Berkeley, after 23 days on the way, and traveling a distance of 4500 miles.

"Here we met our son Marion, who is attending Boston University and has a little church here, where he preaches.

"We are very pleasantly located here, and expect to remain until next June, when the son graduates.

"Our daughter, Martha, has gone west and is teaching at Blue River, up the McKenzie.

"If this does not reach the waste basket, I may write again, of some things we have seen and the impressions received in Old New England. Since here, we have driven over 6000 miles.

"The newspaper reports of the storm are not overdrawn. We are nine miles north of Providence, in the Blaine section.

"In July, after seven days' rain, there was a flood here; several lives lost; but during this storm we were not troubled with high water as they were in Connecticut and Massachusetts."

Letters from Statesman Readers

EASTMAN REPLIES

To the Editor: I have read your editorial regarding my speech before the chamber of Commerce club at Salem, Ore., last Saturday. Now in view of the fact that you fellows promised to broadcast that speech over KSLM and broke your word with me and in view of the fact that you have given me a bad piece of advertising in your editorial I hope you will be fair enough to print this letter in full and send me a copy of the paper it is printed in.

I did not hope to convert any of the chamber of commerce members, but I was agreeably surprised to receive a letter from one saying he was going to vote for the bill. Now I propose this: that you ask what questions you wish on the bill in your paper and then let me answer them immediately below in the same paper. That is only fair. I told you in the speech that there was a clause in the bill that provided that when any component article or product is once taxed it cannot be taxed again in the completed article. If, however, the completed article is so changed that the component part cannot be designated, naturally it cannot be deleted of its tax. For instance wheat into flour. You fellows claim it would raise the price of bread at least 34 per cent, so I was showing you that it could not be more than six-tenths of a cent on a ten cent loaf of bread and then it would be absorbed by the seller. Why don't you kick about the 50 per cent tax now on gas? Why don't you kick about the 40 per cent on cigarettes? And with neither of those do you get old age pensions. Now be fair and publish all this letter.

ELBERT EASTMAN.

Bruin Attempts To Outfit Dogs But Loses in End

SCIO—Refusing to be dislodged from a conveniently comfortable branch in a tree, a black bear spent half the night recently watching the hounds that tracked him.

Scene of this bear hunt was in the foothills in the vicinity of the DeLong farm about 10 miles southeast of Scio. Bears, as usual at this season of the year, had been making nocturnal visits to beehives and apple orchards in the vicinity.

Trail hounds of Roy and Archie Bates took up the bear scent, with above results. Hunters waited from 12 midnight till dawn for the bear to approach, keeping comfortable in the chill autumn breeze with a bonfire near the base of the tree.

Dim daylight permitted a bead on the trusty rifle, and the bear rolled out of the tree with a loud moan. Life safe and secure for both hunters and hounds.

Two Men Injured In Valsetz Crash

VALSETZ—A serious accident occurred on the road here Monday morning when some men were driving into the Spaulding camp below here to work, from Falls City. It was reported that an axle broke and in order to stop the car it was steered into the bank which caused it to overturn, resulting in a broken leg to the driver, Virgil Taylor, and serious injuries to his father. The men were removed from the scene of the wreck to the Valsetz CCC side camp near cold springs and later taken to the valley for hospital treatment.
