

Chrysanthemums On Menu for Soup, Salad

Things aren't near so sunny as they seem, when the head of the Chrysanthemum society of Victoria, B.C. the other day publicly suggested a recipe for chrysanthemum salad he caused quite a furore among newspaper men who evidently had heard of eating flowers. Not strange at all in this idea of eating a chrysanthemum. In the first place, many flowers are eaten frequently, so commonly that we do not think of them as such. Broccoli, cauliflower and artichokes are all the blossoms of plants. We use flowers in the form of herbs: saffron, nasturtium and marigold petals were familiar flavorings two generations ago. Furthermore, chrysanthemum leaves are frequently used as greens by the Japanese who cultivate certain varieties for their leaves. In oriental markets in cities with large Japanese populations, chrysanthemum greens are almost as familiar as endive and mustard greens. They are cooked the same way. The salad as suggested was: boil selected petals for two minutes, then serve with French dressing or any other salad ingredient. And as there is no difference in flavor in the various colored blooms, select those that suit the color scheme. Another recipe offered by the same authority was: CHRYSA NTHEMUM SOUP Heat a pint of milk and a tablespoon of butter, add 2 tablespoons

Green-Ripe Olives Go in Tomatoes

Green ripe olives are found in some markets in Salem. They are spotted green affairs with the texture of ripe olives but a taste just between the two. Wonderful flavor, the best of all olives, think those who know their olives. Here is a recipe that uses green-ripe olives— OLIVE STUFFED TOMATOES 4 large tomatoes 1/2 cup sliced green-ripe olives 1/2 cup grated raw carrots 1/2 cup finely cut celery 2 teaspoons minced onion 2 cubes hard cooked eggs Peel tomatoes and scoop, out the centers, leaving sides, and bottoms whole. Combine ingredients, moisten with a mixture of 1/2 cup mayonnaise, 3 tablespoons Worcestershire sauce. Stuff tomatoes, chill, garnish and serve cold.

Garnish the Meat With Meal's Vegetable

The meal's vegetable can also be garnish for the meat platter, which ties the main course together and provides color for the meat dish. For instance, there's steamed cabbage that can just as well as not be used as a garnish for the meat platter. Quarter the head of cabbage, or if there are more than that to be served, cut the whole cabbage in that many wedges, steam it carefully so as not to lose its shape, then butter, and arrange around the roast on the platter either alternating with the potatoes, or at the opposite end from them. Put on a dash of red 'y sprinkling with paprika or striping with pimiento or adding a slice or two of tomato or some radishes.

Gingerbread Filled With Orange Icing Good

Bake gingerbread in a sheet pan, frost with a mixture of Cream cheese, grated orange rind and juice and spread on the squares that are cut. Make the frosting of 1 package of cream cheese, 1 1/2 cups sifted confectioner's sugar, grated peel of an orange and 2 tablespoons juice. Make to spreading consistency.
