Hurrah, Let's Eat Attitude Helps With Child

Hurrah, let's eat! is the new attitude for families to assume these days when food seems such an important factor in raising children. So much concern is felt for the youngster who prefers dessert to spinach and would rather drink milk than eat meat.

Many theories have been tried out in various families, often successfully, but each parent must work out her own method of coping with the problem of gastronomical temperament. Making mealtime a period of congeniality when the family gathers to talk on subjects of interest to all at an attractively appointed table, will produce far better appetites than discussing grocery budget for breakfast, politics for lunch and discipline for dinner.

When a child expresses a real dislike for food, it's perhaps more practical to leave it off the plate next time; adding a little to the serving sometime later. "I don't like that" is far better changed to "I don't care for any," because nobody is really interested why he doesn't eat and it's a bad habit to get into.

Sometimes a small helping will aid in whetting lagging appetite because it looks like a pretty big undertaking to down a large plate of food when you're not hungry. Fathers of families sometimes present a much greater problem than children because his expression of preference to food gives his offspring ideas. Leaving what is good and what is not of the conversation will help in eliminating dislike for foods in youngsters.

Attractive arrangement of food on the plate always aids a child's appetite. Contrast in color, pretty garnishes, cute plates will all step up the youngster's desire to eat. The observation of this writer, only an onlooker but an interested one, is that most children go through a period of disinterest in food. For several years dining is unimportant, and sometimes underweight is the alarming result, but if you can get enough milk and concentrated vitamins down a youngster through this time, he will outgrow it just as he does the hitting period, the scissors-wielding stage and the making-faces interlude.
