Lifting a small foot in a ner engagement." brown and white sport shoe from the accelerator, the speedometer turned back quickly. In apology to the car as if it were an animal she were driving too hard and too fast, she thought, "It's because I want Christmas!"

It was a warm Saturday afternoon in June. Twilight had scattered coolness. To Constance, driving from the farm where her aunt and uncle lived to the city of Northwood, her home, it had never been a lovelier day. The honeysuckle growing wildly had never been sweeter nor the flowers in untended fields brighter. A shiny brown colt kicked up his ardent heels and went bolting down the pasture. Constance thought, "You're glad to be alive

Everything was beautiful today because Terry Cannon whom she had known and loved for as long as she could remember was coming home. And home to Terry, though in the winter he was the assistant athletic coach in an upstate university, was the big, shabby cottage two doors from the big, shabby cottage of the Darby family on Vine Street in Northwood. She had many memories of the tall, lean, bronze-faced, bronzehaired Terry and all of them were sweet. When they were children, he had protected her during rough games. It was he who had taught her to swim and later to drive a car It was to him she had poured out her moods and feelings since child-hood. But rather suddenly they had ceased to be children and on one bitterly cold January night when they had been skating on the river Constance had fallen and Terry had helped her to her feet. But his arms had stayed around her and a light she had never seen in his eyes had come to them. They had known then that they were not children any longer and that they were as completely and as passionately in love as two people could be. From that ment on, from that first kiss, she had waited for him to finish college and establish himself. Now he was oming home for the summer . . .
