Agreement on Unemployment Amendment

The hearing before the senate revision of laws committee on the proposed amendment to the Oregon unemployment compensation act cleared the atmosphere. Neither representatives of employers nor or organized labor want a $6,000,000 annual "fine" imposed on payroll payers in Oregon. Both sides agree that inasmuch as the federal government's three per cent payroll tax for unemployment insurance will be collectible if the Oregon compensation act is not certified, the latter legislation should be amended promptly so certification will follow. Neither the employing group nor organized labor ask amendments of the anti-picketing act from the current session of the legislature.

Those matters being settled, the only task for the legislature is to amend the unemployment compensation act so it will be certified by the social security board at Washington, D. C. The amendment drafted by Ralph Campbell, attorney for the Oregon commission, will satisfy Washington. It has been approved by Governor Sprague. The amendment implies that insofar as unemployment insurance payments go, the definition of an industrial dispute shall be one which agrees with the definition of the federal act. While that act is silent on the exact meaning of labor dispute, it is assumed that the definition of the Norris-LaGuardia act prevails.

Chris Boesen, attorney for the AF of L, thinks the proposed amendment ambiguous. But he has no substitute which meets his legal view of what would be proper. Inasmuch as Mr. Campbell has definite assurance that the change proposed will win certification from Washington—the only objective now sought by all parties—that amendment should be promptly adopted.

The Acid Test Proves Painless

Oregon's first experience in the use of lethal gas for execution of a condemned man was far less gruesome than the harrowing predictions of the oratorical Senator Ashby C. Dickson. Two breaths of hydrocyanic acid gas and the prisoner was unconscious. Two minutes from the time the first lethal gas was inhaled his heartbeats were faint. In five to eight minutes no beats were observed by attending physicians who gave the opinion that Prisoner McCarthy died in not more than three minutes, suffered no pain after 15 seconds.

The involuntary struggles of a hanged man or the "burning" frequently reported at an electrocution were absent. Quietly, almost painlessly, the condemned man went finally to sleep. Physicians emphasized that death by gas is not due to collapsing of the lungs or to strangulation. Death comes from injury to vital organs and tissues from the hydrocyanic gas. In three to five seconds the brain is inhibited from using oxygen brought in the blood and consciousness ends.

Undue proportion was given the McCarthy case due to the legislative debate immediately preceding it. Actually McCarthy has left life with far less pain than the victim of his gun probably suffered and countless men have died on battlefields in worthy causes without a fragment of the compassion granted this crime-soaked youth. The citizenry of Oregon have dictated that men who kill may be required to pay for their crime with their lives. That being the state's program, protestations over the horrors of the lethal chamber are illogical and not borne out by observation of the actual process.

Recovery Depends on Profits

Colonel Leonard P. Ayres of Cleveland, economist of note, agrees with President Roosevelt that it is entirely possible for the United States to obtain an 80 billion dollar annual income. "This is by no means an excessive national aspiration," says the Clevelander. It is the approximate income the nation enjoyed in 1929, it is only one-fourth more business than was done in 1937. With 9,000,000 increase in national population in the decade, the goal is reasonable.

There the agreement ends. Mr. Ayres insists, as he has for the last five years, that ultimate recovery depends on the investment by private business of idle funds in capital construction. The railroads and the electric utilities must be encouraged and assisted in renovating and extending their plants. And this expansion cannot come until business has some assurance that making a profit is not socially wrong. A decade ago 60 per cent of the firms in the United States showed annual profits; in the years beginning with 1930, only three businesses in ten have shown ability to keep their ledgers in the black.

The obvious weakness in a national economy dependent on government for the bulk of its capital outlay is that government exists only by taxation or debt. Taking money from individuals or corporations to create work does not add to the stream of business; funds which could be used for private investment are diverted to the federal treasury.

Six years of experimentation in taxing and spending or borrowing and spending has not brought the 80 billion level of activity the nation needs for economic good health. Inasmuch as Mr. Roosevelt years ago conceded that he was like a football quarterback who called a new play if the first one tried did not work, a test of the Ayres' formula for recovery is in order.

Chore for Merriam

Howard Merriam of Goshen has been named "permanent president" of the reorganized Pacific highway association. Merriam is the genial Lane county filbert raiser whose courage in voting against a Townsend resolution in the house here four years ago lost him his legislative topknot in a recall flurry.

Merriam will need all of his geniality and courage in his new chore for we note his first responsibility is to raise money for the association treasury. That is as hard a job as battling with OARP or increasing the filbert yield. Everyone along highway No. 99 wants an association, seeks more traffic and is ardent for a $20,000,000 highway reconstruction project. But getting the hard dollars into the association's treasury to back the work—that is something different.

The new "permanent president" will find out, as has the Oregon Coast highway association, that most chambers of commerce will protest insolvency and inability to put in a penny in the good work. The county courts may be persuaded to include a few hundred dollars in their budgets for the good of the association but their budget allocations will be tied with the string of reciprocation from all other counties along the highway. The private contributors are potentially numerous; hotels, auto camps, service stations; but when the acid test of pungling up funds for the association comes, the squeals and squirming will dishearten a less affable gentleman than the man from Goshen.

Mr. Merriam must not be discouraged, nevertheless. The Pacific highway is the basic road of the state. Large sectors of it are thoroughly obsolete. Ed Miller, working in a less densely populated territory, has battled through for six years raising budgets for the Oregon Coast highway association, an organization which has had a major role in the rapid improvement of that road and the amount of traffic it carries.

Bits for Breakfast

By R. J. HENDRICKS

Barry, historian, declares 1-21-39 murals in new state capitol deplorable; that not one of the four applies to this state:

(Continuing from yesterday:) Still quoting Barry: "The landing of Gray, Boit and Hoskins in WASHINGTON is historical, for WASHINGTON.

"They were the first AMERICANS to land in WASHINGTON. That is appropriate to WASHINGTON.

"Yet four years before the first AMERICANS (also the first historically known white men) landed in OREGON, 1788. Question: WHY IN THE NAME OF COMMON SENSE WAS THAT WASHINGTON landing selected instead of the OREGON landing four years before?

"That selection is characteristic of a grade school at crossroads.

"Since the landing of Gray, Hoskins and Boit was selected, then two matters were imperative. One is SCENERY.

"The lading was near (present) Knappton, just across from Astoria, with a ferry several times a day in summer.

"It is extremely scenic. The wide water, the lofty forested ridge on the right, westward; four promontories jutting out.

"Lewis and Clark could not pass Point Ellice, so camped on a raft of driftwood logs in a 'nitch' or cove, apparently at (present) Megler. The forest was too thick for the hunters. Even today no road crosses that densely wooded ridge. Read the Lewis and Clark account.

"November 7, 1805, they were at the Jim Cross point, by Pillar rock, and heard the ocean breakers. I went there to look. One sees the open water, and while from the top of the hill the actual ocean is in sight, the curvature of the globe limits visibility from the level of the water. It is a mere quibble that owing to curvature of the earth the actual water seen is not the ocean, merely because one on the river is not high enough to see the ocean beyond. They skirted the shore at Gray's bay, which they called Shallow bay; camped at about Gray's point, then kept moving down, finally to Megler. Gradually various men began going past Point Ellice. Lewis went to Cape Disappointment and Long Beach.

"The main expedition camped near McGowan (Chinook point, Fort Columbia.) Clark went around Cape Disappointment and up Long Beach.

"Anyone, second or third class artist, in drawing a historical scene, should have read the Lewis and Clark description of that vicinity. If they did not know enough to know that Lewis and Clark had written so much of it, some one ought to have told them. Instead they depict Chesapeake bay scenery — and get away with it. Oregon PEOPLE are involved.

"Are Oregon people so stupid and boorish as not to know what Oregon scenery looks like, in such a famous and accessible place as the vicinity of Astoria? Have they never read the Lewis and Clark accounts of that locality? Can they be goldbricked, and not have sense enough to know it?

"Did anyone ever know of a tree being buried top-downward in the sand with the roots sticking up in the air? (Note: This is merely my own personal idea, but that chromo looks to me as though, from gross slovenly sturidity, the painters did not find out where Gray was, or what the landscape is, so, as a ruse, put that preposterous root to conceal the landscape, because they did not have enough gumption to know what the scenery is.)

"They have a point which may be Point Ellice, or some point near the home of the painter. They were in Portland, and saw how the fires here have left a few of the former giants, dead, mute witnesses to what the original forests were. They stick up one old dead tree, ugly. When Lewis and Clark were there, the forest was too dense for the hunters to penetrate.

"What is needed is for some Oregon newspaper to get photographs of that scene. In photographs hills look too low, which ought to be corrected by painters. That lofty ridge, with precipices at the points, is scenic. Anyone can go by ferry to Knappton and look. Oregon people have been goldbricked—unless it be a practical joke to find whether Oregon people are as orrygonny as jocular notions make us to be, with duck feet and goose heads.

"Gray's log has been available for nearly a century and a quarter. It is published by the Oregon Historical Quarterly, page 252, and the mate, John Boit, wrote a journal (in same Quarterly, page 308.) Quarterly, December, 1921.

"Gray first anchored off Point Ellice, then went to Gray's bay, to the vicinity of Gray's point, came back a way, prouably to near Knappton, then Gray wrote that he and Hoskins went on shore. Boit wrote that Gray and he (Boit) went on shore. Also: 'NONE OF THE NATIVES CAME NEAR US.' (Page 311, top.)

"I enclose list of men on the Columbia. Originally there were 30. One died, three were murdered, leaving 26." (This list is preserved, with all the original matter making the present series, and will be filed for the use of future historians, and in order to correct mistakes, if any, in this series.) Resuming the Barry copy:

"Haswell and Monte (or Waters) with a crew were detached on the sloop Adventure. The remaining officers were Gray, Haswell, Boit and Owen Smith. Owen Smith was left in charge of the vessel when Gray, Boit and Hoskins went ashore.

"There had been many attacks by Indians, and, two nights before Gray entered the Columbia there was a night attack. Presumably 10 men remained on the ship, ready to shoot cannon if Gray, Boit and Hoskins should be attacked. Probably four men took them in the jolly boat, then remained with muskets ready in case of an attack.

"The vessel was some 14 miles from the ocean, in a narrow channel and an extremely awkward place for an attack, so that every possible precaution would naturally have been taken.

"That chromo is ridiculous, and, if meant as a practical joke, it is a poor joke. If Oregon lacks enough knowledge of rudiments of history to be gulled by such a chromo, it is a terrible exhibition."
