Death of Dr. Wilson

Dr. Clarence True Wilson who died Thursday in Portland was staunchly supported and warmly admired by thousands of friends. To his enemies, largely persons who were rabid in their antagonism to prohibition, Dr. Wilson was a "blue nosed" zealot against whom their sharpest barbs were thrown. Whichever point of view one held, it cannot be gained that Dr. Wilson was a brilliant speaker, an effective writer and an Oregon ecclesiastical leader of national note.

When only 18 he was admitted to the Methodist ministry, the youngest man to be thus honored. In his earlier years he served large pastorates in the church. In 1910 he became general secretary of the Methodist board of temperance, prohibition and morals and by sheer force of personality and driving endeavor, made that board most active in the national fight to make the country dry. He learned the catch-as-catch-can arts of the Washington lobbyist; he carried his program of prohibition to the rostrum of thousands of churches throughout the nation; when the prohibition movement flagged, he took to the lecture stage and did forensic battle with Clarence Darrow across the nation.

Of his sincerity and zeal in the prohibition cause there can be no question. Dr. Wilson hated liquor and all the train of evils it use brought. He struck out to protect his nation from liquor's blight and prohibition was the only method he believed would effect the cure. In the history of national reform he deserves a place; whether the method he believed would effect the cure was sound, only trial and error will finally determine.

Off stage and in the quiet of a friendly discussion, Dr. Wilson was not the puritanical zealot H. L. Mencken made him out to be. He was charming and gracious; a man of quick mind and ready wit. Oregon loses a moral leader in his passing.

Democratic Dilemma

The dilemma of the democrats of Oregon was aptly portrayed in Portland in an illuminating meeting of the Willamette Democratic society. Monroe Sweetland, secretary of the Oregon Commonwealth federation, urged the society to unite for "liberalism" in 1940, read ex-Governor Martin out of the party and refused to surrender to conservative and industrial interests. Louise Palmer Weber came back as only Mrs. Weber can at the Commonwealth visitor. "If the Commonwealth federation is so powerful, where is our governor, where is our United States senator, where are our representatives?" she queried.

Either Mr. Sweetland or Mrs. Weber can answer that question. The democratic candidates of 1938 are in a trench dug by party disunion. While the Commonwealth federation influenced the primaries, as Mr. Sweetland stated, it lost the general election. In Washington, where the state democratic leadership denounced the Commonwealth, boots and breeches, the party held to its power.

The split in Oregon is typical of the democratic party breakup now in progress throughout the nation. Mr. Roosevelt is determined to continue the unsuccessful purge of the summer and fall. He has thrown the excess relief appropriation back at congress, continued his scrap with Senators Glass and Byrd and will probably further deepen the party wound by naming a left-wing member to the supreme court.

While the Commonwealth democrats and the right wingers are fighting for control, a substantial sector of the party and the always restless middle-road voters are going republican. They did it in Oregon in 1938; the omens are impressive that they will do it nationally in 1940.

Wanted: Good Westerner for the Court

President Roosevelt is said to have in mind the appointment of Senator Louis Schwellenbach of Washington as successor to Justice Brandeis. The report is probably true for Schwellenbach was among the favored three when Hugh Black was elevated to the supreme bench. He has been a sturdy, unwavering partisan of the administration and it would be on this score that the selection would be made.

The west would like a man on the supreme court. Certain problems such as mining, water rights, irrigation and public power, come to the high court from western cases. A man who has been trained in the law and on the bench in this territory has the background to write opinions on these cases. But the geographical location of the new justice is of far less importance than his merit.

The weakness in the appointment of Senator Schwellenbach is his limited legal service and his total absence of judicial experience. He is a young chap, who at the last minute decided to enter the democratic primary in Washington. Nominated, he caught the democratic swing and went to Washington. His loyalty to Roosevelt has caught the president's fancy, but like Senator Black, Schwellenbach is not a man whose background makes him a good appointee. Compared to a jurist of the calibre of Brandeis or Frankfurter, his stature is puny.

The president has partially redeemed his blunder in the Black appointment by naming men of the character of Reed and Frankfurter to the bench. He should not resort to party politics in filling the present vacancy.

"Divine Discontent" of the Idle

When Anthony Eden visited the United States, the opinion was expressed with considerable unanimity among newspapers that he was here to "sell us a bill of goods." The suspicion seemed so obvious that The Statesman did not bother to concur, but instead discussed other aspects of his visit.

It now appears that, whether Eden sold or attempted to sell anything or not, he was in turn "sold" on one or two things about the United States. In the House of Commons the other day he advocated a change in England's relief program including projects similar to the CCC, and he lauded what he was pleased to call the "divine discontent" of America's unemployed as contrasted with the complacency of England's two million idle persons.

It is a healthy sign when our unemployed protest and agitate, even though their boisterousness sometimes becomes obnoxious. We would like it better if they were more consistent in demanding work, in making jobs for themselves where none exist, rather than demanding public largess; but any protest is better than none. It is a personal calamity when any one of them becomes resigned to the "relief" role as permanent; it will be a national calamity if the unemployed as a class become content with their present status.

Bits for Breakfast

By R. J. HENDRICKS

Barry suggests that the inscription on the new state capital statutory be poppycock for the new state capital statutory.

A letter, dated Feb. 16, on the desk of this columnist from J. Nelson Barry, historian, Barrycrest, 2822 S.W. Greenleaf Drive, Green Hills, Portland, Oregon, reads:

"The new statutory for the state capital represents 'LEWIS AND CLARK LED BY SAGAJAWMA.'"

"Therefore it may interest you to have some historical data on that subject. 'That some 'Great River of the West' existed was long known, and Lewis and Clark had provided a little information regarding central Montana, but no white man had ascended the Missouri river beyond a few miles above the mouth of the Yellowstone river, which is about at the Montana North Dakota boundary."

"The Lewis and Clark expedition wintered at the Mandan-Hidatsa villages in what is now North Dakota, but could obtain no information in regard to the Great River, the Oregon or Columbia. The Indians only knew of small streams on the western side of the continental divide. After crossing the great divide to the vicinity of the present Salmon City, Idaho, the Shoshone tribe there knew of the Humboldt river in what is now Nevada and the Gulf of California, but did not even know where the Salmon river flowed beyond its entrance into the canyon a few miles from their village."

"Since an interpreter who understood the Shoshone language was needed, and a French Canadian named Toussaint Chaboneau had a Shoshone wife, he was engaged as an interpreter for the crew of Indians in order that they might bring his wife who added a picturesque aspect to a military expedition of the U.S. Army, especially since she had a very young baby. She was very useful in finding edible roots and plants, and in other ways. She only understood the Shoshone and Hidatsa languages. Her husband only understood French and Hidatsa. Interviews with Shahaptian, or Nez Perce, Indians were by the Nez Perce speaking to a Shoshone slave, who translated into Shoshonean, which Sacajawea translated into Hidatsa, and Chaboneau into French, and a Frenchman translated into English for Lewis and Clark."

"The Shoshones of her tribe used rattles made of reeds, and the Hidatsa Indians used the made of buffalo skins called 'bull boats,' so that Sacajawea had never traveled in a craft which could go up-river. She had been raised in the locality east of the continental divide between what are now Montana, Idaho, and Wyoming, and the other localities she recognized were in an area about the size of a county, while she had never previously heard of the Columbia river or Pacific ocean."

"She had been captured at Three Forks by the Hidatsa, whom Lewis and Clark called Minnetarees, and taken overland to the Hidatsa village, in what is now North Dakota, so she did not recognize any locality for 107 days, when, on July 22, 1805, she first recognized a stream near where Helena, Montana, now is. She was familiar with the river from there to modern Armistead, Mont., where the canoes were left."

"Lewis wrote in his journal that if she had enough to eat and had some trinkets, she would be contented anywhere, and liberally left her behind with the main party, while he and three men went ahead of the boats, on foot, and found his own way across the continental divide at Lemhi Pass, to the Lemhi tributary of Salmon river, where he made friends with the chief of the Shoshone tribe, and persuaded the chief to return with him to meet Clark, telling him that there was a Shoshone woman with the expedition."

"The chief suspected treachery, so Lewis exchanged clothes with him, and let the chief wear his military cocked hat and plume."

These three women, all of whom have taken part in the care of Marion Talley's three-year-old daughter, Susan, are shown as they attended the suit for custody in New York.
