Getting in by the Back Door

Twenty-two years ago this month, when the United States was about to enter the world war, informed commentators as we vividly recall, did not predict the United States would send its troops to France. The Allies, rather, were to receive "loans" to prop up their tottering finances. Then it was suggested that the United States might well subsidize the artillery. Sheridan's men were Allies by outright gifts of munitions. There was talk that American forces should be sent to Mexico to resist a threatening German protectorate over that nation. The idea of a who received the sword of Lee large American expeditionary force on the continent, while were Sheridan, Ord, Grant. Grant fully considered by the general staff, was not freely discussed had, two years before, been

Actual engagement in the war brought a swift change in the nation's role. Within a year American troops were in the trenches. It was their participation in the summer and fall of 1918 which rallied the tired Allies and brought German

Twenty-two years later is noteworthy to see how closely editorial discussion parallels the predictions of 1917. The Medford Mail-Tribune comments:

"The only chance of preventing a general war in Europeand a war that in all likelihood would spread to the western hemisphere-is to convince Hitler that in case of such a war, he would have the unlimited resources of the United States against him. This would not necessarily mean sending any American troops to Europe. It might only mean, placing the wealth and the industrial capacity of this country behind the opponents of Hit-

In similar vein, the New York Herald-Tribune declares that the United States should immediately-not waiting for

"... lend the democracies its firm diplomatic support and full cooperation in such things as fiscal and commercial policy, airplane contracts and so on. If general war results, the United States should be frankly prepared to make its economic resources available to them, . . the United States will not commit itself to

Before the United States, in advance of the next war, makes pledges of economic participation it should first realize full well that men will follow the munitions. The nation cannot have a large economic participation and keep its troops home. The separation of dollars and infantry did not work 22 years ago. It will not be possible now, other editors to the contrary.

Moreover, the nation should not indulge in wishful daydreaming that "loans" to European belligerents will be repaid. Repayments were fragmentary until 1932 and for seven long years since that time neither Great Britain nor France has made a serious overture to make any payments or to scale-down ten billion dollar world war debt which would go far to reducing the domestic debt burden the federal government has incurred in the interim. Nor has any sensible economist any hope that this war time hangover of obligation | coast, in Salem the night of Noto the United States will ever be paid.

The United States does not approve the theft of Czechia and Slovakia and has a duty to make its horror of Hitler's body in Oregon, official, military banditry known. Yet the original Czechoslovakian republic or what not. did not sign. It was a republic France was treaty-bound to protect, an obligation ignored at Munich and again ignored

We are dubious, therefore, about the wisdom of advising the European democracies that the United States is again ful influence in Oregon politics. to be a white-knight, protecting democracy throughout the world. The overtures worked poorly two decades ago. The politics. country will be displeased with its bargain if it tries again to untangle Europe's ingrown situation. Above all, the United States must refuse to believe it can give money aid and keep its troops home. Economic assistance to the democracies will be a backdoor entrance to war.

California's Liquor Headache

California, which permitted the private sale of hard li-quor after the abolition of prohibition, is face-to-face with the hard chore of drastically curbing the number of liquor from Oregon, showed his symlicenses it issues. So great is the pressure of liquor distributors for outlets, so hungry are retailers for the large markup liquor provides, that the state now has 27,000 licenses for liquor sales outstanding-about one for each 225 citizens. The result is a plethora of distribution; communities the size of Salem have 150 licensed dealers in intoxicating bever-

The state committee on liquor control has finally awakened to the weaknesses in the California setup and is trying, belatedly, to curb the ease with which new dealers get permits. In last year alone 4500 additional licenses were issued and at the rate of increase, every other store will soon be peddling hard liquors. So the commission has gone to the legislature and asked it to take away the commission's powers to issue new licenses. It has also suggested that as rapidly as possible the permits be limited to one for each 750 metropol-

The possibilities for corruption are plentiful. Few dealers once embarked in the business—the average markup is 40 per cent on the selling price—want to lose their license franchise. The liquor distributors, thirsty for volume, know that the greater the number of outlets, the larger will be state sales. So the commission is already besieged with protests and it will be hard-pressed to make effecutal its curtailment program, even if the legislature gives its approval.

California's experience reveals the soundness of the Oregon control plan. There is no interconnection between liquor sales and private profits. No retailers have any vested interest in liquor's distribution in their communities. The political maneuvering always resulting from a license setup is fell, Oct. 21, 1861, at the battle avoided. Whatever profit is made goes to the state and is in turn dedicated to the use of relief. Oregon claims no perfection for its Knox act but it can be thankful that each butcher, baker and hotel keeper is not now clamoring for a license.

Financial Ring-around

The New York Federal Reserve bank reports that in the last five years commercial and savings banks, life insurance companies and savings and loan companies have increased their investment in governmental securities $17,000,000,000. Net increase in other investments by these concerns is slightly more than one billion dollars. At the same time private investors have sought government bonds because of their tax exempt features. The result has been the economic phenomenon that a nation with a budget startlingly unbalanced has been able to add to its debt at the lowest interest cost in the nation's history.

The effect of this borrowing and buying has been quasinationalization of all these credit agencies. A 10-point collapse in government securities would jeopardize the financial solidarity of all these institutions; ergo each issue of governmental securities must be bought by private banks to eliminate this danger. Should a saturation point ever be reached and the federal bond market impaired, the government itself through the federal reserve banks, the social security reserves and the stabilization fund, has ample moneys to protect its tional conf own securities. It is this vicious ring-around which makes federal budget balance doubly difficult. A private spender is usually checked by weak credit; he must retrench or go bankrupt. Unele Sam, in stark comparison, is so far into private concerns 1- they dare not dump his securities at the true market.

Bits for Breakfast By R. J. HENDRICKS

The historic Nesmith house at No. 679 North Cottage is being given some modern improvements: 8 8 8

(Continued from yesterday:) Sheridan said the deep snow made the work extremely labo-"exhausting men and horses almost to the point of relinquishing the struggle, but our desperate situation required that we should get down into the valley beyod, or run the chance of perishing on the mountain in a storm which seemed unending."

Ord was in that campaign with Nesmith and Sheridan. Ord had a detachment of the Third dragoons; called cavalry now. Regular readers know that the three generals at Appomattor raised to captain, and had resigned from the army, expecting to stay out; resigned because his lieutenant colonel (Buchanan) had barked a hardboiled order to him that he must drink less or quit the service.

April 25 following (1856) found Sheridan at Fort Yambill which was his headquarters till Sept. 1, 1861, when he departed for the Civil war.

Nesmith had removed from Salem with his family to the farm, the house still standing back of the newer one on the south side of the highway from Salem to Dallas, about a mile east of the town of Rickreall.

The road or trail of the old days between Fort Yamhill and Salem went by way of Cooper hollow past the site of Monmouth, thence past the Nesmith house on the Rickreall and down that stream to the ferry, where the north part of West Salem is now.

So 2nd Lieut. Eheridan, Capt. David A. Russell, Capt. DeLancey Floyd Jones, Captain Macfeeley and other officers at that headquarters post, when making trip between Salem and their fort passed the Nesmith home, Sheridan and Nesmith became well acquainted. No doubt young Sheridan danced at the fashionable balls of the day with the Nesmith daughters, who had the highest culture of their time and section. Sheridan attended the grand ball of dedication in the great warehouse room of the Willamette woolen mill, first of its kind on this vember 17, 1857. No doubt the Nesmith girls were there. Political feelings ran high in the last of the fifties. The issues that brought on the war were growing hot. General Jo-Lane had been supported in all his political ambitions by Bush and Nesmith and The Statesman.

But, as .he discussions of the events which brought on the Civil war grew hotter and Lane, as the Oregon territorial delegate in congress and as one of the first United States senators pathy toward the forces of secession, Nesmith and Bush refused to follow him so far.

Came the time in the fall of 1860 for the election of United States senators by the Oregon legislature. Col. E. D. Baker was the candidate of the newly born republican party.

But there was no chance of the joint session of the legislachoosing him, or coming to a decision at all, without some kind of a compromise. Many months ago, this column gave the details of the long fight. It ended in a compro-
