CHAPTER XIV

While the two strode aft, their footfalls drawing sullen reverbera-tions from the silent steel hull, Colby sensed a subtle change to be coming over Mears. The big watch-man seemed no longer the slow, phlegmatic individual he had known. Apparently his deliberate wits had taken in all angles of the problem and he was now eager and alert. "Reckon the stuff must be there all right," he stated. "We saw that late come off."

Colby nodded absently, his thoughts rushing ahead, trying to foresee what might happen when the Benet jewels would be exposed. A quarter of a million! Would their eyes in a few moments feast themselves upon the long lost hoard which Geneva Benet sought so earnestly? Where had she been during this little affaire? That kiss, had it been a clever bribe? A disarming subterfuge? Surprisingly soon Mears and the soft treading ex-soldier found them-selves in that disordered cabin where the lanterns still burned pa-tiently drawing golden high lights from Tug's curious tools and the time of the year."
