You "Can't See" Television?

From the purely mechanical standpoint, television has arrived. Several companies have perfected broadcasting and receiving equipment up to a fairly acceptable standard. From the economic and social standpoint, television is in comparable position to Bonneville dam. Nowhere in the United States is it operating except on an experimental basis, and mountainous difficulties lie ahead.

Typical of the difficulties is that involving frequencies. Nineteen channels have been reserved for television in the frequency range between 30,000 kilocycles and 300,000 kilocycles. Most of the receivers soon to be placed on the market are capable of receiving only the seven channels below 150,000 kilocycles, some will receive only five. No sets have been developed to receive any of the 12 channels of the higher frequencies. And so far, one television channel requires a frequency band width of 6000 kilocycles, which is 600 times greater than the requirement for ordinary sound broadcasting, and 5 1/2 times greater than the entire radio broadcast band accommodating 800 radio stations. Obviously, this will greatly limit the number of television broadcasts unless some refinements are possible, and while some television engineers claim they are making progress in this direction, it involves defiance of a fairly well accepted physical law.

The natural answer would be the establishment of a few nationwide stations—and the necessity for development in this direction is enhanced by the financial problems. The federal communications commission television committee, in a report just released, asserts that "cities of less than 100,000 population may have difficulty in supporting one television station, and in cities of population less than 1,000,000 it may be difficult to operate two television stations on a profitable basis if reliance for financial support must be placed upon advertising as the only source of income." However, the committee reports that practical television service on a nationwide scale is not likely to be possible soon; numerous technical, organizational and financial problems remain to be overcome.

The most difficult immediate problem involves standards which would enable each receiving set to receive any television broadcast. It would be a simple matter to establish such standards and some, at least, of the companies interested in television are urging that this be done to facilitate commercial expansion of the industry. But in view of the certainty that further improvements will come rapidly, the committee foresees a dilemma; either technical progress will be retarded so that these standards may be maintained for a reasonable length of time, or the standards will have to be altered and all of the first sets rendered obsolete.

Despite the technical progress that has been made, the obstacles appear all but insurmountable. Will they be overcome? Not in a year, nor entirely overcome in five years. The answer is, of course, eventually, yes.

In some foreign countries television has progressed more rapidly under government control. In "tight little" England the British Broadcasting corporation is already conducting broadcasts on a practical scale. About 1 per cent of the population owns sets—meaning possibly 4 per cent see the broadcasts more or less regularly. Government ownership might expedite progress here—but the United States has developed radio to a higher degree than other countries through private promotion, and would be loath to accept Europe's solution.

Corruption in Law Enforcement

Evidences of conditions "shocking and almost beyond belief" in the operation of the Washington state patrol is alleged in a report just issued by a grand jury at Olympia. The report deals principally with the activities of William Cole, who resigned last January as chief of the patrol, and his alleged use of the police organization's equipment and man-power to feather his own nest. Cole has been indicted upon charges of grand larceny and misappropriation of state equipment and the labor of state employees to his own use.

Chief among the findings of the grand jury was that "a virtual parade of paddy wagons and state trucks for the past several years wended its way over highways from Olympia to portions of eastern Washington and back to Cole's ranch, carrying sacks of wheat, livestock, loads of potatoes and other products. Among other things carried to the former chief's ranch were loads of pipe, cement, shingles, veneer and other types of lumber for building purposes."

There was the case of the transportation of a heavy bulldozer from Grand Coulee to the chief's ranch without cost to him, in the guise of "an experiment in overloading on the highways." But the even darker implications of the case are contained in the observation that these "Cole ranch caravans" would "usually follow close upon the culmination of labor and strike difficulties in various localities of the state." The jury concluded that it was Cole's habit to intervene unwarrantedly in labor strife and then collect his toll.

Corruption in law enforcement agencies, as is charged in this case, is nothing new, though it has been rare in state-wide agencies such as the Washington patrol. If Oregon's experience has been happier, some measure of the credit of course belongs to the personnel of our state police, and another portion to the state officials who selected their officials. But in the last analysis the people should pat themselves on the back; their refusal to fall for jittersbug politics such as prevails in the state to the north is the real explanation. Beyond that, there is no room here for smugness. There are plenty of communities in Oregon where law enforcement by the local agencies is far short of what it should be—and there again jittersbug politics may be found at the bottom of the condition.

Film Punches no Longer Pulled

In recent years it has been the policy of Hollywood to offend no foreign country. Mexican villains were "out" royalty even though its nationality might be anonymous was never ridiculed, and only the mildest of fun could be poked at the people of any land—these people were all customers, for the sale of American films had been internationalized.

Recently there has sprung up a tendency to reverse this policy with respect to the dictatorships. It so happens that the first picture of this type to reach Salem, "Confessions of a Nazi Spy," is appearing this weekend in a local theatre.

Bits for Breakfast

By R. J. HENDRICKS

King Louis Philippe 5-23-39 of France gave a lift to the St. Paul Catholic church: Capt. Menes' story:

(Concluding from yesterday.) The $1 for the coffin of the principal merchant of St. Louis? Does the young reader think that was cheap? It was rather high, for the time.

The great grandfather of this writer, buried near there in that period, rested in a coffin that cost $8. And he was a well to do physician. He lived at Waconda—old Waconda, ghost town that was killed by the railroad which passed it up and favored Gervais. Times have changed.

Gervais largely took the place of St. Louis, for, though the Catholic church, second in Oregon in age, still flourishes. The administrator of the estate of Captain Menes of course was obliged to give a bond. It was a $16,000 bond. The bondsman, qualifying for the amounts named, follows:

F. E. Eldridge, $5000; James Cacey, $2000; A. C. Keen, $2,000; Mathew McCormick, $3000; Andrew Lashapell, $4000; Geo. E. Miller, $800. Note that it was $800 for the good.

"Andrew Lashapell" signed with a mark. That is the way the person who took his oath spelled the name. His real name was Andre La Chapelle, and he came to the Oregon country in 1822, or before, in the employ of the Hudson's Bay company.

The advertising that was done by the administrator of the estate of Captain Menes furnishes some items of historic interest. The notice of appointment was published in the Capital Chronicle, Salem, the $6 bill received by J. H. Upton, publisher, for the five insertions, beginning in number 25 and ending in number 29, volume 1. The receipt was dated March 23, 1868.

The numbers show that paper was only 25 weeks old at the time of the advertisement's first insertion. The foreman of the paper, swearing to the insertions, was John D. Yates. The Chronicle became the Capital Chronicle Mercury of Col. ("Bud") Thompson. Upton, when he first arrived in Salem, worked in Barker's furniture factory, which stood on the site of the Marion hotel. He next had a paper in Lafayette, then in Curry county; also was a lawyer, and a specialist in politics. Went to Langlois, Curry county, and prospered.

The notice of final settlement was in the Oregon Unionist, Salem, of S. A. Clark, who received the $5 bill Sept. 4, 1869. Henry Denlinger swore to it as foreman; a well known old time printer.

The American Unionist published the sole notice, getting $12.25 for it; sworn to by H. F. Levins, foreman, Nov. 10, 1863. The same paper got the citation to heirs notice, receiving $14; the receipt by Huntington & Co., per Bowman.

That was J. W. P. Huntington, whose wife was an A. plegate. He was at one time an owner of The Statesman. He was Oregon Indian commissioner; died in Salem, and had the largest funeral turnout in history here up to that time.

Rev. Bartholomew Delorme, who came from France with the party arriving in 1847 as one of the two deacons soon became the cure (pastor) of the St. Paul's Catholic church, and prominent in Oregon Catholic affairs generally.

He was the parish priest at St. Paul's when, September 4, 1850, he attended to the burial of the body of the Dorion woman in that church, and wrote the record in the old register, which has lately been taken to Portland for safer keeping. "In that church," some one will ask, "Yes, the burial was in (under the floor of) the church."

It will be recalled that the record in the old book was in French, and for that and several other reasons it was for a long time lost to history, and the object of what is constant search. The marker in that church was dedicated Sunday, April 7, 1925.

The papers in the jacket at the Marion county court house at St. Paul's when, September 4, 1850, he attended to the burial of the body of the Dorion woman in that church, and wrote the record in the old register, which has lately been taken to Portland for safer keeping.
