Young Artist Is Recognized

Byron Randall of Salem Sells Watercolors in Washington, DC

A discouraging bus journey across the United States with 75 pounds of water colors under his arm, figuratively, has ended for Byron Randall, 20-year-old Salem artist, with reward in the form of purchase of 33 of his pictures by a Washington, DC, gallery, a fiveyear contract and promise of a showing of his work there without expense to him.

News of his success came to his parents, Chief Deputy Sheriff Kenneth Randall and Mrs. Randall, tion in 1913 to April 30, 1939, late last week in an entertaining letter describing the trials of a cording to a report released by young artist out to market his pro-

> Painted Since Seven Byron has been intensely interested in his art work since he was seven years old, according to his mother, and has virtually lived, eaten and slept in his world of painting. assortment of paintings.

The trek from one art gallery or museum to another was a discouraging one, young Randall wrote, and he "felt humble and very much out of place with my crude painting" in the presence of exhibits "of the best old masters." But, finally, in Washington he consulted a librarian to whom Val Center, had referred him and folhis paintings to the Whyte gallery in the national capital. Ensuing events he described in his letter as follows:

"Mr. Whyte very frankly tells me, before we go any further that even if he likes my work, he couldany of them. But he looks at them anyway. I stand around for four hours while he looks them over which is more thoroughly than I figured was necessary if he wasn't buying or showing them. 'Well,' he says at last, 'maybe I can use one or two."

"I feel like kissing him but instead I stand around with a poker face while he looks at them some more, now assisted by two secre- for four years and has been a fed-

"The payoff is a five year contract with the Whyte gallery, which makes them sole agents and gives them first option on all of my work and also a renewal option at the end of five years.

"Mr. Whyte is a very nice sort of a fellow, and his gallery is very nice. Right now he's showing Raol Dufy, one of the greatest French contemporary painters.

"The gallery bought 33 of my water colors outright. The price was not too good but I think more than fair since they are paying all expenses for a show in the near future. The price will be better as soon as a reasonable market is built, which will take a little time. Maybe a lot of time, but I'm a patient animal. It gives me a living in the meantime.

"Well that's about all the news. I'm leaving for New York in the morning. It's very enlightening, this trip has been. It's interesting and different country than the west coast. You see no end of brick buildings and brick streets that might be very old.

"Well as I said before, its been tough fight but the first round is all sewed up."

Lincoln Boom Days Recalled

Polk Town Once Thriving Center for Shipping of Grain Crops

The days when Lincoln, now the site of a single crossroads store in Polk county, was a thriving grain shipping center were recalled yesterday by the announcement of the second annual Lincoln-Zena homecoming, to be held all day next Sunday at Mickey's park, one-half mile south of the Lincoln store. Old-timers recall the picnic site as "Toners' pasture."

At its prime, near the turn of the last century, Lincoln boasted six steamboat arrivals and departures a day during the grain shipping season, a sawmill, grist mill, beehive factory, harness shop, jewelry repair shop four large warehouses, grain elevator, blacksmith shop, slaugh-ter house, church, village hall and general store. The store was operated by L. Abrams, father of Col. Carle Abrams of Salem.

Ferry Was Busy
The Lincoln ferry, regularly patronized by Salem people after the Willamette river bridge was washed out by high water in 1880, was run by the father of Captain J. M. Spong of Salem. The son became a leading Willamette river pilot. "I've seen farmers' wagons lined up from the river to the store on the hill waiting to unload wheat," recounted Frank J. A. Boehringer, president of the homecoming committee. "We had a lively community, with industries, river freight business and stagecoach service daily to and from Salem and McCoy. Now Lincoln is only a crossroads.
