

1st Dams Are All in South

Lane County Gets First Work Under Project Appropriation

(Editor's Note: This is the eighth of a series of articles on the significance of the Willamette valley flood control project.)

Farmers in this area may wonder why one of the two Santiam reservoirs is not designated for part of the initial expenditures under the Willamette basin development project, since floods of any proportion result in vast losses in this section.

The reservoirs which have been selected for first work, Cottage Grove, Dorena and Fern Ridge, are all in Lane county and all on the Willamette or its head water tributaries. Reservoirs at the headwaters, the area in which greatest floods occur, will also reduce to some extent flood situations in the Linn and Marion county Santiam sections, and for this reason these dams were chosen for first work.

Run-off Controlled
Through the seven dams, the anticipation is that flood run-off will be controlled fully 75 per cent at Eugene; 53 per cent at Albany; and 57 per cent at Salem.

Funds to be available for flood control work in the fiscal year beginning July 1, approximately six million dollars in the Willamette valley, would not construct any of the four remaining dams, as the least expensive of these, the Detroit reservoir on the North Santiam, will cost about $5,650,000.

Marion county people, especially, are interested in the Detroit dam, for fate of the North Santiam highway, shortest cut into eastern Oregon, is wrapped up in this part of the valley project.

The Detroit dam will be highest of all the reservoirs, and will be across the North Santiam at a point 6.5 miles down stream from Detroit, or 13.8 miles upstream from Mill City, and a quarter of a mile east of the western boundary

Church Dress for First Lady

Here is the gown Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt chose to wear at Hyde Park church, where the First Family of the United States was host to the royal family of Great Britain. The print motif of the silk chiffon dress is American goldenrod and Scottish thistle, the latter as a compliment to Scottish-born Queen Elizabeth.

of the Willamette national forest.

This project will call for relocation of 12.5 miles of highway, and this highway work will be started as soon as possible after beginning of the new fiscal year, as $500,000 is allocated for this road change in the first Willamette valley basin project funds.

Actually, around $3,000,000 will ultimately be spent in making the North Santiam a superb highway into the valley, R. H. Klipp, executive secretary of the Willamette river basin commission, declared in a recent address before the Salem chamber of commerce.

Dam 400 Feet High
The Detroit dam will be about 400 feet high, will have a normal pool level of 266 feet above the present average, and like the Quartz creek dam on the McKenzie and the Lookout Point dam on the Willamette, may eventually be used for power purposes under the coordinate plan for the valley.

Not only relocation of the highway, but relocation of the town of Detroit is planned in construction of this reservoir, for it will flood out Detroit, as the lake will extend up the river nine miles, and at the present townsite will be about 1 1/4 miles wide. The body of water will extend up the Breitenbush three miles beyond the confluence of the Santiam and Breitenbush.

The dam, to be an estimated 3 1/2 years in making, will include a drainage area of 438 square miles, a reservoir usable storage capacity of 322,000 acre feet, with a lake surface of 38.40 miles of which 3550 will require clearing. And for this, the expected outlay, including the town's relocation, is $13,615,000.

New Budget Plan Put in Operation

Quarterly Budgeting May Save State Money, Eccles Hopes

A new budget setup, through which David Eccles, state budget director, hopes to save the state a substantial amount of money annually, has been approved by Governor Charles A. Sprague and is now in operation.

Under Eccles plan the budgets of various institutions, departments and commissions, will be prepared in advance on a quarterly rather than a monthly basis. This will give the budget director an opportunity to check the proposed expenditures before they actually are made.

are below the estimates approved by the budget director the surplus will go into a reserve fund to meet emergency requirements.

Eccles said the new system would reduce the bookkeeping requirements in many state units. He asserted that the previous monthly system of handling budgets was unsatisfactory. The state liquor control commission and a number of other state activities are not subject to the budget control set up by Eccles' department.
