Sprague Hails Basin Project

Governor Holds Project Signal for General Development

(Editor's note: This is the 10th of a series of articles on the Willamette valley flood control project, its history and significance).

The Willamette river basin project is a signal for general development and will lay the foundation for widespread expansion of all industries, Governor Charles A. Sprague declared in an address Friday night before 250 Lane county leaders, gathered in Eugene to celebrate the approach of first actual construction work on this project.

Governor Sprague, like former governor Charles H. Martin who appointed the valley project committee early in 1935, has been vitally interested in development of the valley. It will be recalled that as result of a bill which passed the 1939 legislature, he appointed the three-man Willamette river basin project commission, which will lend co-operation to Major C. R. Moore, district engineer, Portland district office of army engineers, who is directly in charge of the project for the federal government.

Solution of Problem
And Major Moore, in an address in Salem early this month, described the project as the solution of the most serious problem confronting the valley and forces with its completion a rapid and healthy growth for the valley.

Major Moore pointed especially to the navigation features which will come as result of the project, a phase of which entails rebuilding of the locks at Oregon City through substitution of a single and wider lock to replace the four locks now in use and which now take 2 1/2 hours to get a log through. The navigation development will release huge timber holdings in the valley. With controlled stream shipping will become a vital factor and it will become an easy matter to release the vast timber supplies. At the present time it is estimated there are 124 billion feet of timber in the valley and that there is a sustained growth of 615 million feet annually.

Navigation Aid
From a navigation standpoint, those leaders who worked long and earnestly for the project say Salem will become another The Dalles. The reservoirs will help make possible a 6 foot minimum water level at Salem, so it does not seem far fetched that the day is not long distant when $200,000 steamers with 5 1/2 foot draft—such as today operate on the Columbia—will be commonplace at Salem. No one has put in figures what this feature alone will mean in the industrial and business life of this city and of the valley.

Other major factor, supplemental moisture, shares with navigation the spotlight in the secondary phases of the flood control project. This will be discussed in the next article.

Provision has also been made, under the coordinated plan, for creation in later years of power from the dams built for flood control. With this in view, the dams will be built of sufficient height to store the water for flood control, but also so these dams may be raised later to a height adequate for power production. However, Bonneville power will be used up before the power resources of the valley flood control project are brought into play.

The coordinated or distant view plan provides for power development at three dams, at Detroit, Quartz creek and Lookout Point and it is estimated that each year the valley will benefit to the tune of more than $4,000,000 from this factor.

The army engineers believe enough hydro electric machinery can be installed at these three dam sites to develop about 413,140 kw. of hydro electric energy and about two billion kilowatt hours annually for the valley.

One's imagination may run freely on the industries which such development of power could materialize from the resources of this area.
